To All Lovers of Bapu

PREFACE

The senes of events which I have tried to portray cover a period of seven mooths ending with the incarceration of Mahatma Gandhi in the third week of March 1922 to perspective these events fall under something like the following heads—

(i) Awakening meaning a political awakening on a mass-scale through the Noo co-operation movement

(ii) Preparations meaning preparations on a mass scale for a political struggle of a non-violent character

(iii) Oo the March meaning the progress of the strongle in its critical stages

truggle in its critical stages
(iv) Halt meaning the state of abeyance in the struggle implying a fresh course of preparations

I propose therefore to divide the whole period covered by The Seven Months into a number of Parts each Part concentrating oo one or more of the different phases of the Movement. The present volume attempts to give a picture only of the first two phases. The socceeding phases will form the subject matter of another volume to be brought oot as quickly as circumstances would permit.

The phases of the Movement enumerated above are broad outstanding divisions. In the course of the narrative however. I have thought fit to enter into many a detail which throws into considerable relief the parts played by some of the leading actors. In particular I have sought to incorporate many minote incidents and events of Mahatma Gandhi's daily life otherwise of oo special significance which help to bring into nearer view some vital features of his composition. The public are aware of that side of his character which is revealed by the part he has played in the Non-co-operation drama. But there also I have tried to throw as much light as possible with the help of facts which came under my special observation. These will bring into broader view Mahatma Gandhi's essential attitude in many a crisis in the progress of the Movement.

In Mahatma Gandhi's view, for 'the attainment of Swaraj by Indians, there is no alternative to the Non-violent Non-co-operation method, except of course, the method of modern military warfare, which has proved such a dismal failure in the West, and which unless repudiated betimes will involve the West and modern civilisation in one common ruin. There are people in India who incline to the view that there is a via media. If, indeed, there be one such, their efforts will succeed. But Mahatma Gandhi strongly holds the other view. If Mahatma Gandhi is right, the Non-violent Non-co-operation Movement will be able to re-assert itself with even greater power, as soon as the newer methods latterly adopted by the Congress have had their full and final trial.

This volume baving been long overdue and having had to be hurried through the Press proofs of most of these pages could not be looked over by the author. A number of errors have unavoidably therefore crept in but it were useless to enumerate them here in the shape of errata. The reader however would be in a position in most cases to correct them for himself. But there are it appears a few errors which might present a little difficulty and among these are the following —

INTRODUCTION

WHILE staying with Mahatma Gandhi I had absolutely no idea of writing a book about him Towards the end of 1921 when the political firmament of India was overcast with dark clouds, and many of his lieutenants and faithful followers one by one were removed from him some by imprisonment, some by the call of duty elsewhere it fell to me to assist him in his correspondence and in the editorial work of Young India Then I happened to see all his papers and had exceptional opnor tunities of studying at first hand the lines of thought that guided him in conducting the great movement inaugurated by him It was Mahatmaji's practice to destroy almost all important papers after they had served their purpose and I too, began to do likewise Seeing this, a friend one day asked me to preserve all important papers but I locosely replied that I was an iconoclast and not an idolator

Of course I said this in quite a humorous sparit, for I believe that so long as a man pays homage to some great ideal or aspiration he cannot help being drawn by secret attraction of sonl to one in whose exalted personality he finds reflected that ideal and that aspiration. And this is the genesis of Hero-worship. Hero-worship has been and will ever be in this world, and in worshipping the hero we are really worshipping the ideal.

At that time, however, the pressure of daily events and the daily correspondence overwhelmed me so completely that it was simply impossible for me to decide which papers to preserve and which not. Moreover, I had no idea at the time that it was at all possible for me (adequately) to give an account of what I saw and felt about this mighty movement.

On my return to Bengal a few months after Mahatmaji's incarceration, all my friends were eager to hear of him from me, and some even pressed me to write down my experiences during my stay with him. During the seven months that I had the good fortune of living with him, I had kept a regular correspondence with my revered teacher, Shriyut Satis Chandra Mukerji, and as he was anxious to hear from me regularly and in detail all about me, I used to write to him at length about everything. Fortunately, he had preserved all my letters with great care, and it was at his instance and under his encouragement, and mainly with the help of those letters, that this book has been written

Those who have intimately associated with Mahatmaji may feel the detailed descriptions in this book somewhat superfluous, and sometimes even repellant. But the revolution in the thoughts and feelings of men and the awakening among the masses that Mahatmaji has been able to bring about by the movement of Non-co-operation, though it has been hailed as unique in the history of the world, may soon in the natural course of time, sink into the oblivion of the past. And though posterity may be eager to know and understand the intensity and magnitude of the movement and the awakening by it, no definite picture of the same may be available at that time. The bisic principles of Non-cooperation have indeed been explained and discussed in many a book, and Mahatmaji s own writings will remain for ever the supreme authorities on the subject. But the story of the wooderful upheaval among the masses wrought by Mahatmaji s movement, although it might continue to hold the imaginations of men as o glorious tradition would remain obscure in the absence of a faithful and detailed record. I admit that no description could possibly portray and revive the memory of this great upheaval. Moreover the movement is still in process and none can tell before hand what unnumbered events may yet not follow. Never theless. I have tried with the help of such insight as I had gained by an intimate contact doring these seven months with Mahatmaii to preserve as far as I could the memory of the enger hopes and enthusiasms that swaved the minds and hearts of the Indian masses from the Himalayas to the sea at that moment of the new awakening and of the dominating infloence wellded by the stopendous energy and the in comparable sweetness of his personal character

I believe that the way in which Mahatman has been seeking through this movement, to purify politics and raise it to the level of religion has already had the effect of initia ting a movement of change of an epochal character. There have been in the past movements for Swaraj or independence in all countries and there will be such movements also in the future, but the method by which Mahatmaji has been trying to achieve Swaraj is such that If it succeeds it will have chaoged the course of men's thoughts, and will have midded substituted for brute force. Truth, Justice and the Power of the General Will. By the application to the sphere of politics of the principles of Ahimsa or Non violence, and of Satyagraha' or application of Truth-Force by the scheme of Mass Civil Disobedience, it disobedience to unjust or non-moral laws, by fulfilling the programme of Charka and Khaddar of Hindu-Moslem Unity and the removal of Untouchability, etc., which are the several items of the constructive programme, Mahatmaji has been serving the cause not of India only, but of the whole world

The remedies that Mahatmaji has prescribed tor India's political, economic and social ills, according to the diagnosis which he has made of them after deep thought and analysis and with the help of his penetrating insight, are not only fraught with good to the untold millions of this country but their success here in India will suggest to the suffering and downtrodden masses of the world, the means of their own emancipation. The truth which is at the root of Mahatmaji's solutions and methods, in relation to social, political and economic problems, and which he has been seeking to popularise through a wider preaching of the Spinning Wheel has by itself the potency to cope with the prevailing unrest among the masses throughout the world

The Spinning Wheel is to my mind the only antidote to the virus which selfish greed and commercial exploitation following in the wake of Machinery, have scattered throughout the world. Moreover, in Maliatmaji's teachings there is such an appeal for self-examination, self-purification, and transformation of the inner life that it opens out the path of man's physical, intellectual and spiritual progress and brings out the essential harmony that subsists between Dharma (code of duties), Artha (wealth, or means of enjoyment), Kama (enjoyment), and Moksha (liberation from desire for enjoyment) Therefore this teaching is founded on eternal Truth and as such if its fundamental ideas are applied to the building up and guidance of men all over the world—there is bound to be an opward trend of the world—s thoughts and sentiments and the unrest begotten of the disturbance of equilibrium caused by commercial exploitation is bound to disappear.

Disease of one kind or other manifests itself from age to age in the body corporate of society. When the power ful classes, instead of devoting their power to the service of the masses use it for purposes of self aggrandisement, then there comes a period of great suffering for the latter and it is this sufferiog that initiates a revolutionary epoch. From the history of Lurone we see that in some epochs power was in the hands of the priests and in others in those of the rulers bot in the present age the development of science has led to an abnormal extension of man a power over the forces of matter and simultaneously power has become concentrated in the hands of the big capitalist classes and their scope for compassing selfish ends and the exploitation of the masses has grown to an almost inconcrivable extent. The result of this has been the ushering in of uprest and discontent all the world over

Under the stress of this unrest and discontent every where in the world the old social and political institutions are giving way and in their place everywhere we notice the manguration of new theories and new modes of constructive effort. But all the newborn methods that have so far been advanced or resorted to to re-establish social peace and order in the West are all founded on materialistic conceptions of life. The efforts that have been pot forward instead of attacking from within the problem of deterioration that has overtaken the internal man, under the stress of modern materialistic civilisation, seeks only to combat social illa by a mere change in the externals of social life has not yet established itself securely in the Western world that it is not possible to recover in Society, moral health and peace, be it by a thousand reshufflings of its external relations, if Man's spirit continues to remain narrow and materialistic in aims and outlook. The fact of the matter. however, is that the movement inagurated by Mahatmaji has, for its cornerstone this vital truth. And it is because he desired to effect a radical cure of the diseases from which the body politic is suffering that at the very base of all his movements, political, economic, social, etc., we find as an ever insistent factor, the need for self-purification Mahatmaji's efforts are crowned with success, then that ancient Law of Truth and Purity will once again in this world, re-assert itself in a renovated form

My faith is that with the success of this great work of Mahatmaji there will arise throughout the thinking world an eager desire to learn about his modes of thought and his message. But in order that we may thoroughly appreciate a man's thoughts and teachings, it is necessary, in the first instance, to become intimately acquainted with the facts of his life, for it is undoubtedly true that the acts of a man's life are, as a rule, guided and regulated by his inner feelings. If a man's thoughts and teachings are thoroughly sincere, then even the minor incidents of his daily life, reveal the deeper meaning and purpose of his teachings and the inner springs of his conduct. For, indeed, there is an invariable correspondence between his words and his actions, and on many an occasion his actions illustrate his words—that is why I have thought fit to enter into minute details of many incidents of Mahatmajis daily life. I know not whether I have succeeded in bringing into view the special features of his character and his unique personality. For in proportion as and in the manner in which I have been able to comprehend him in that proportion and in that manner only, have I been able to paint him. And as a result, if any circums have crept in I crave the reader will forgive me reprembering that they have not been wilful but owe their origin to misjudgment on my part.

WHEN I HIRST SAW MAHATMAH

IT was in November 1920 that the whole of India was stir red to the depths by the news of the students strike in the renowned Aligarh College under the influence of the Non co-operation movement. The waves of excitement gradually spread from Allgarh to the Benares Hindu University First Mr George Joseph the editor of the Allahabad Independent then Moulana Mohammed Ali and after him Pandit Motifal Nehru had come to Benares and addressed the students, to win them over to the principles of Non-co-operation and finally towards the end of November Mahatma Gandhi hintself, had arrived. His arrival was the signal for an unprecedented wave of excitement and enthusiasm in the city and the Hindu University itself began to tremble to its foundations. I was at the time living with my revered teacher Shriyut Satis Chandra Mukerii formerly Principal of the Bengal National College and Editor Dawn Magazine Calcutta.

Immediately after his arrival so a friend informed me Mahatmaji had addressed an audience of students at the University on the morning of the 26th November. In that speech after describing the Panjab arrough and the interference by the British Government with Moslem religion in the matter of the Khilafat he had counselled the students to non-co-operate by way of a remedy. At the same time he had warned them against doing anything under the influence of passion or any momentury impulse. His advice to them was that they must not take any decisive step without making sure that they were following the dictates of their innermost self, the voice of the spirit within. This led a student to put the question "what is this inner voice? We have never had the good fortune to hear it." To this Mahatmaji made answer that this voice of the inner spirit could only be heard by those who practise self-sacrifice (i.e.) Tapas and Brahmacharya, and that they could never go wrong who had learnt to abide by the verdict of this inward monitor.

Then I learnt from another friend that Mahatmaji had invited the students to a discussion at his own residence at 1 pm. So I went there at this hour, and found him seated in the midst of a large circle of them.

That was my first sight of Mahatman He was speaking so low that his voice was getting drowned by the sounds of footsteps of people moving about So I moved a bit nearer and took my seat not lar behind him, when quite abruptly he exclaimed "The spirit of the Lord is come to Hindusthan Has it not?" I noticed that, in order the better to impress on the minds of his hearers any particular matter or any particular idea, he would move his right finger keeping time with his words. Then in reply to a question from a student, he went on explaining on what basis an Ashram should be established to train our boys along right lines At this moment, the youngest son of Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya came in, and whispered something in the ears of Mahatmaji Mahatmaji at once stopped the discussion, and coming out, took his seat in a He was accompanied by Pandit Motilal Nehru I learnt that he was going to Malaviyaji for a discussion on

Non co-operation with him My impression up to then had been that Mahatmail had a listless and tired look perhaps owing to some weight on his mind but when he cordulally invited Motllalli to get in and moved a little to make room for him I saw that a light flashed in his eyes and his face brightened up

I saw him for a second time the same afternoon, when he addressed a mass meeting in the Benares Town Hall compound But now his face wore an altogether different look. Seeing that the noise and hustle had not ceased he stood up and moving round and round and beckoning with his hand called upon the people to observe silence and be seated in their places. I observed his smiling face, his flashing eyes and his steps and it seemed to me that he was eager to distribute all the gladness of his heart. It was such a huge gathering! In fact. I had never seen such a gathering in Benares before. I stood behind watching the doings and the hehaviour of the crowd Then I saw Babu Shivaprasad Gupta rising and raising his voice to its highest pitch but I could not distinguish a word from where I stood far behind I wondered if I could ever hear Mahatmaji's voice from that distance but when he began to speak, sitting in a chair I could distinctly hear every word Yet it did not appear that he was straining his voice or making any serious effort to make himself heard. When in the course of his exposition of the programme of Nonviolence in solemn accents he attered the words. If you draw the sword you will perish with the sword. It was so thrilling that the words are still ringing in my ears

After this meeting Mahatman attended a conference of the Professors of the Hindu University in the evening

There, one of the Professors asked him how it was that he called upon everybody to follow the dictates of his own conscience, when a study of history showed that wherever, war, strife and bloodshed had taken place, it had all taken place in the name of conscience. Mahatmaji's answer was, so I was told, that, while it was true that there had been much wrong done in the name of conscience, it would be proved by weighing the evil done in the name of conscience against the good, that the latter far outweighed the former Mahatmaji also pointed out the need for emphasis on self-control and self-sacrifice, in the lives of men, as a safeguard against the abuse of conscience, and explained that, by preaching Non-violence side by side with the need for following conscience, he was trying his best to avert war and bloodshed

The state of things among the students was somewhat perplexing. There was still as before the same enthusiasm, the same excitement, but they could not decide on any definite course of action. If only Mahatmaji had definitely called upon them to leave their College, they would readily have done so, but instead he simply asked them to think out the problem for themselves, and decide as to their duty

The next day (27th November 1920), Mahatmaji again addressed a gathering of students in the College Hall, under the presidency of the Vice-Chancellor Pandit Malaviyaji himself. Having received previous intimation, I was able to attend the meeting Mahatmaji said that he revered Malaviyaji as his own elder brother, he had hoped they would work hand in hand like brothers for the country's good, but most unfortunately, they had not been able to see eye to eye with each other. When he had been to Aligarh to counsel the students to non co-operate the sight of the mighty structures of the College and the recollection of the glorious achievement of Sir Syed Ahmed had almost overpowered him with grief and the thought came to him if he was after all doing the right thing. But the inner voice gave him the clear assurance that what he was doing was thoroughly right. Here too in spite of his regard for Malavivan and his appreciation of the Hindu University in obedience to the call of the spirit within and the call of duty he was bound to tell the students that, if in view of the Punjab and the Khilafat wrongs the truth had at all dawned upon them that the present Government stood for injustice and unrighteousness it was their clear duty to have nothing to do with that Government In such a matter it would not do to think of the future If any of them came to know that their teacher lived by robbery should they then think of their future studies? or should they immediately leave off all connection with him? In the same way if any of them felt in their heart of hearts that the actions of the Government were untruthful and unrighteous he would unhesitatingly advise them to cease to have anything to do with it and would assure them that the mere ability to renounce evil company would lay the foundation of their character and would of itself be no small education. If on the other hand they continued to co-operate with what was unjust and wicked knowing it to be such but not having the strength sternly to set their faces against it then with all their encyclopaedic learning they would remain as cripples for ever and beyond working as slaves of others they would not be fit for any independent function in life. Hence he told them that if they accepted his view of the present Government as evil, it was their religious duty to non-cooperate with it. Not in a spirit of haughty defiance, however, for there is no place for haughtiness or defiance in non-violent non-co-operation, which was a movement for self-purification. And if they decided to leave their college, they should reverently wait upon their parents, and, if possible, get their permission, and at the time of leaving, they should see Malaviyaji, and humbly prostrating themselves before him, ask for his blessings.

After this a considerable number of students visited Mahatmaji at night, and said that fivehundred of them were prepared to leave in a body, provided that he would start a National College for them—But Mahatmaji asked in reply. "Of what possible use would it be to him if somebody made a gift to him of one lakh of counterfeit rupees." He should be greatly troubled to keep them, but if he got a single genuine rupee, he could hope to do much with it." He went on to ask, "If they knew that there was a serpent lodged in their room, would they pause for a moment to reflect where they should go, or what they should do, but would they not straightway leave the room."

Hearing Mahatmaji's reply the students were greatly troubled as to what to do Mahatmaji made it clear to them that it was no good starting a National College all at once, since they would hanker after the very same methods of study as in the Government Colleges which would not lead to any change in their life and character. His aim was to help in developing strength of character, and he wanted, therefore, to test their regard for truth and justice, and their capacity for sacrifice

Professor Kripalaniji of the Hindu University had

non-co-operated on the occasion of Mahatmaji's visit to Benares. Mahatman instructed the Professor to make a selection of those students only who under no momentary impulse of excitement but, as their deliberate indement wanted to non-co-operate and with them to start an Ashram to train them in the first place in methods of self-support and self trust. He asked the Professor to see that students of the Ashram learnt to stand on their feet and not depend on their guardians for financial help and further that they were trained in the habit of doing their own work with their own hands. Thus in accordance with Mahatmail's instructions and under the leadership of Professor Kripalani, the Gandhi Ashram of Benares was established by some earnest and energetic youths of the Hindu University and they set themselves to the task of educating themselves and build ing up their own character with a view to be of service to their motherland.

CHAPILE II

EXPERIENCES OF A DAY

Some time after these events Mahatmaji himself officialed as high priest in Bombay at a sacrificial offering of a huge pile of foreign cloth which he set fire to with his own hands The imposing ceremonial was witnessed by more than a hundred thousand people, and the stirit created had filled the whole country. About this time one day my esteemed friend, Professor Kripalani, came to my teacher, Mr Mukerii, and informed him that Mahatma Gandhi would be due at Allahabad on the 9th of the month, and he would be soon leaving for Allahabad to place before Maliatmaji the Budget of his Ashram (Benares Gandlii Ashram) that time my health had distinctly gone down. Since a long while past I had been ill, and recently I had got worse. My teacher had, therefore, decided to send me down for a change of climate to Mr. Purnendu Narayan Sinha's at Patna Professor Kripalani however, suggested that instead of going to Patna I might try Allahabad and accompany him there Mr Mahadev Desai was then on the staif of the (Allahabad) Independent as Joint Editor, and already our relations with him were intimate. Mr. Kripalaniji's proposal commended itself to my teacher and he was willing that I should try Allahabad for at least a week, putting up with Mr Desai If, however, the place did not suit me, he said, I might leave for Patna

The next morning (10th August) accordingly in the company of Kripalaniji, I took a B.N.W.R. train to

Allahabad and about 11 O Clock arrived at Pandit Motilalit s place. I had long been hearing of Anand Bhavan Panditji's famed residence With his active entry into the Non-co-operation movement it had sprung at once into prominence as a chief centre of Congress activity. It is a massive pile standing in the midst of a large garden Making our way through the garden we came, before the building and there found Mr Desal standing as if expectant ly awaiting our arrival. As soon as he caught sight of Kripalaniji his whole face lit up with a smile He theu ran up to us and receiving Kripalaniji with an affectionate slap on the back, escorted us both to a room at the further end of the house. There on a cot, sat Mahatma Gandhi intent on the study of some papers which lay before him and two young men sat in chairs on his right, assisting him in his work. When Kripalaniji went and made obersance by touching Mahatmaji's feet, he lifted his eyes and receiving him with a broad smile exclaimed-So you have come? I only stood at a distance reverently looking on. I did not feel inclined to go near his presence and offer my salutations, as I felt it would be impudence on my part to do so I had rarely seen such a smile as that with which Mahatmaji greeted the Professor Ills whole countenance expanded like a (China) rose in bloom and displayed an uncommon loveliness. I noticed that whenever in the conveof his talks, he burst into a smile the same indescribable brightness lit up his eyes and face. The Professor had taken with himself a Khaddar dkon woven in his own Ashram for a present to Mahatmaji. As soon as it was produced before Mahatmaji he proceeded to test the yarn and then smiling said in Hindi 'I want sixty crores worth of Khaddar Of what use would a single piece of dhots be to me As long as the total required quantity is not forthcoming, how may I put on such a big piece of dhoti * I would have to tear it and make short loin-cloths out of it before I could use it " Then the Professor said "Given the capital, is there any special difficulty in producing sixty crores worth of Khaddar"? Mahatman answered-"Why, already there is one crore of rupees at your disposal as capital What further capital is needed that also would be available "This conversation over, Professorii was going to introduce me to Mahatmaji But some six or seven people having then entered the room, I had time to tell the Professor that I was quite happy in having had an opportunity of seeing Mahatmaji from a distance, and that he would be conferring on me a favour if he complied with my request not to take me to Mahatmaji I felt that I had no business to waste his precious time Finding that I was so very unwilling, the Professoi refrained from taking me to Mahatmaji Subsequent to this, after bath and meal, once or twice did I enter Mahatmaji's room, and I noticed that he was deeply intent on his work

Pandit Motilalji, all smiles, was moving about welcoming every guest. After some time spent in talks in Mahatmaji's room, he said he would be attending Maulana Mahomad Ali's durbai, and with this he left and repaired to a Hall in the central part of the building. It was for the first time then that I heard that Maulana Mahomad Ali was there. I had for long been familiar with his name, and naturally I felt the eagerness to go and have a look at him. So, I followed Panditji into that hall and there found

^{*}A long piece of cloth worn round the waist by male Indians

Maulana Saheb seated in the midst of a group of persons mostly Mussalmaos. They were putting him all sorts of questions and he was replying in broken accents. It appeared to me that his voice was naturally so broken. It was as if the sounds proceeded from his very stomach and one got the impression that each single word of his was being projected as it were from within. His conversation his general demeanour in fact everything about him showed that he was n man endued with high spint and courage.

After nowering for a while the quenes out to him by people about him the Maulana Saheh rose and left I set out in march of Professor Arinalani and after much wandering about discovered him engaged in conversation with a gentleman whom I did not know He was showing him the report and other papers connected with his Ashram From the year way in which they were talking with each other I could however easily make out that he was no other than Pandit Jawharial Nehro the renowned on of Pandit Motifal Nelson. It was for the first time non that I san Pandit lawharlal the very image of the spirit of sacrifici and straightforwardness. Of his virtues I had heard from many lins. I stood quietly behind hearing them talk but without disturbing them Jawharlajii was talking in a low volce but his words were rapid. With a little attention I could discover that while the sounds were so low he would now and then speak out with a sudden jerk and emphasis on particular words. His countenance his words and his manners all showed that then, was not any mental reservation behind his speech that in fact his exterior was so to say a true concrete representation of his interior I noticed also that the presence of Mahatmaji had brought there a large body of other leading men of Allahabad, whose names so often figured in the papers. Besides, under the shade of the trees outside, sat many who had come from the villages around

Wandering about and merely observing things I got tired, so, I rested for a while in a chair on the verandah where many others also were seated Just at this time a motor car drew up at the gate. I then learnt that Mahatmaji was going to a meeting of ladies, from where he was to proceed to a mass meeting on the grounds of the Swarai The moment we heard that Mahatmaji would be Sabha coming, presently we all rose to our feet Soon he came, rather suddenly holding Jawharlalu by the hand His steps With eyes turned towards none, he moved fast and stood at the gate Already, however, having seen the car arrive, the people from 'the villages, who had all been resting under the trees all hurhad ried to the gate and clowded about the car to get a Darshan (auspicious sight) of Mahatman Finding that it was not possible to force a passage through the crowd and reach the car, Mahatmaji checked his speed, and came to a rather sudden halt Jawharlalji now made an appeal to the people to divide and stand in two rows, so as to make a passage for Mahatmaji They obeyed his instruction, and stepped aside forming two lines and a path was made for Mahatmaji to walk and reach the car Still Mahatmaji did It was as if he was looking out for an not move opportunity how effectively to make a dash through the small crowd Pandıt Jawharlalji on hıs part was repeatedly enjoining the crowd that no one should leave his place and attempt to make a move towards Mahatmaji But this appeal fell on deaf years. At the sight of Mahatmaii these people it appeared had become quite beside themselves. With eves rivetted on his countenance they gave themselves up to loyous cries. Their eves betraved as if they had transported themselves into some dreamland. Their regard for lawharlaln was deep that is why they obeyed him and remained standing in two opposite rows. But when he warned them not to leave their places it seemed as If the warming did not reach their ears at all. Mahatman was weking for an opportunity of making a dash, through them Precisely in the same way the crowd stood lying in wait as it were for an opportunity to touch his person. This was much like what we see among children running and playing when one among them suddenly stops to seize the opportunity of touching the body of his rival. The shouts of ' ial (victory) to Mahatma Gandhi had for a moment diverted my attention to them but that very moment Mahatmari had made his way to the car and had got himself seated. A this the people seemed to have lost all self possession. Crowding round the cur on every side they began to press and jostle about and it seemed as if they would smash the car In this confusion with no other alternative before them the car was driven forward. The scene is indescribable, there was the continual shouting and crying of victory to Mahatma Gandhi while on the ton of it was this mad struggle to get near. It would be no wonder I thought if some one in the crowd got smothered under the pressure. Even after the car had begin moving no small number of people clung desperately to the two sides and kept on hanging. But the speed increasing they all got down one by one guickly enough. The whole of the

all the while Such a sight was altogether a novel experience in my life. As an ocular demonstration of the people deep love for Mahatman, this little incident indeed was most striking. But it also showed to me for the first time to what tyrannical excesses love may go. Mahatman having departed, the house relapsed into dull stillness. So many people had been coming and going but now one by one all had left no one knew for where

Professor Kripalani now came and told me that it was absolutely necessary for us to be at the public meeting before Mahatmaji arrived, for otherwise it would not be possible to get admittance. I had no previous experience of the sort of commotion amidst which I had been moving that day, my life had till then been hied in reclusion was therefore quite agreeable to toflow the head of the Professor wherever he should direct my steps. His plan was that we should reach the office of the Ir lefe dert* first, and then come to the public meeting in the company of Mr Mahadey Desai. Then a certain heavy, plumpy, jovial gentleman offered to get us to the Independent office. His son would be presently coming in a car, and he would ask him to reach us there. This gentleman was Mr Shyamlal Nehru, as I learnt afterwards from Professoria He was then conducting the Democrat newspiper. He was full of fun and humour, with an ever beaming countenance I had seen him during midday entertaining Mahatmaji in his room for a pretty long time with all sorts of stories. In answer to the query whether Kripalaniji would be able to identify his son the Professor pointing to Mr. Neliru a bage balky frame said that just as it was impossible to mistake the father so also it would be impossible to mistake the soo He would be able to identify the son from his likeness to the father. On this Mr. Nehru burst into a roar of laughter and left.

Arriving at the Independent office, shortly after we found Mr George Joseph the Editor and Mr Maliades Desail both very busy with their work. Air Joseph having written an article criticising Mr. Chintamani * Mr. Desai was engaged in looking over the proofs. The latter while at work made a casual remark that Mr Joseph was bound to get imprisoned directly that article came out. From the talk they were having with each other I received the unpression that it was their belief that Mr. Chintamani, was a man who could hartly brook public criticism of himself The reading of the proofs over Mr Desai read out to us two articles from Mauiana Mohamed Alis pen written at Mr Desais instance, under the title of Undelivered letters one of which was addressed to Mr Sherwani and the other to Mr Raoga Iver Having heard the letters so humourdy written it was impossible for us to cease laughing for a while Thus the hour for the meeting having drawn near from the Independent office we made straight for the Swarai Sabha maidan (grounds) where the meeting was to be held

The sight that met my eyes was that the maidao was oo longer a maidan but a verstable sea of heads. All were waiting in expectation of Mahatmaji. The way to the platform, for the leaders, was from behind, where volunteers kept strict guard Mr Desai took me with him by that way to the vicinity of the platform and himself took his seat on one of the steps leading up to it and asked me to do so noticed that at one corner of the meeting place there was a huge collection of foreign clothing got ready for Mahatmaji Pandit Motilalji's contribution to that pile deserved special mention. His foreign neckties suspended by a tope in the shape of a garland in his own house had already attracted my attention. In addition he had sent for the bonfire some other foreign clothes including fine garments of foreign make Even from that distance I could descry among the articles piled up some highly expensive apparel The crowd was so vast, and yet there was little disorder All were waiting patiently. A short while after, Mahatmaji arrived followed by Maulana Maliomed Alı, Pandit Motilal Nehru, Jawharlal' Nehru, and others Mahatmaji's eyes were not turned away anywhere, he rapidly mounted up the steps and took his seat on the dais Pandit Motilalji commenced the proceedings by offering a warm welcome to Mahatmaji, Maulana Maliomed Ali and the other assembled leaders, and the speeches followed Mahatmaji first addressed the audience, and was followed by Maulana Mahomed Alı As soon as he got up, a man from a distant corner rose and shouted at the top of his voice that the Turkey cap on the Maulana's head was of foreign manufacture, and with this he began abusing him. This insult to the Maulana agitated the local leaders not a little, but the former with a wave of the hand calmed the audience and taking the cap in his own hand exclaimed to the audience that though in shape it resembled a Turkey cap, yet as a matter of fact it was made of Khaddar * The gentleman referred to was thus silenced and he quietly resumed his seat. But the incident gave to Maulana Saheb's speech almost the character of a reply to many false accusations levelled against him by his political opponents god especially by the Leader newspaper of Allahabad. Maulana Saheb was followed by Mr Stokes. What was my surprise when I heard him give his speech in such good Hindi and with so much ease! After Mr Stokes Mahatmaji made a second short speech setting forth his argomeous in support of the destruction of foreign cloth, and calling upon the people to keep to their reats and not crowd about the pile of foreign cloth when he would go to light it. But the moment he rose from his sent, the whole audience stood up also. He theo hurriedly left to set fire to the clothes and having done so guitted the place

When the meeting was over all order among the crowd was at an end. Neither of us knew our way and it was already dark. How to get back home was therefore a problem. As we were wandening about puzzled what way to take we meet a friend of Mr. Mahadev. Desal's who arranged for our retorn home.

Returning to Anand Bhavan we saw two carriages laden with the loggage belouging to Mahatmaji and his party ready to leave for the station. Seeing that Mahatmaji was preparing to start. Kripalaniji told me that he also most accompany him to Patna, for so far nothing had been done about the business which had brought him there. The news that Kripalaniji was about to take leave of me made me sad. I told Professor Kripalaniji that after he had left,

Indian hand-spun and hand woven material

I also must return to Benaies He was a little concerned to hear this. For it was his belief that a few days spent outside Benares by way of a change would set me up therefore proposed to me that it would be better to carry out my original programme of coming to Patna instead of But the day's confusion and exitereturning to Benares ment had so much told upon my nerves that my inclination at the time was to go back to Benaies And I remembered also what my teacher had told me when I left Benares had warned me against following Mahatman in his tour, seeing that my body should hardly be able to bear the strain of such journey But Kriplananiji kept on pressing me to come along with him to Patna However, about half past eight in the evening, I arrived at the station and got a seat in a compartment at some considerable distance from Kripalaniji after having taken all possible care Mahatman to make me comfortable joined Mahatmaji in his compart-Getting into the train my first thought was that on my arrival at Patna, I must write to my teacher explaining the whole situation, and when he had heard all about it, I felt sure, he would not take me to task If I had to return to Benares, I must get down at Mogul Serai about one in the morning But having made up my mind to go to Patna and knowing that the train would reach there at day-break, I went to sleep quite unconcernedly

CHAPTLE III PREPARATORY TO INTRODUCTION

At the Buxor Station about three in the morning the Professor came and woke me up. I then perceived that Mahatmaji and his party had already got do on there. They would tour round the villages by motor holding meetings at five different places and then reach Sasaram about five in the evening. Such was the programme that had been fixed up. As there was not much room left in the cars Professor Kripalani had remained behind. But he would get down at the Arrah Station, and from there by the Light Railway he would go to the village Vikramajit where Mahatmaji and party were expected to arrive by 12 noon. Thereafter Professoryl would awal himself of the 1-30 p m train and rejoin Mahatmaji at Sasaram. Two volunteers deputed to look after his comforts were uccompanying him.

When it was about dawn we reached the Arrah Station Professor Kripalani had been going to Sasaram singly. It was his inmost with that I should remain with him till we reached Patna together. It was more for this reason that he was making this long detour by way of Arrah otherwise he might have even at some inconvenience to himself gone by motor along with Mahatmaji s party. In this situation could I leave him? I felt therefore constrained to get down at Arrah. The narrow gange line train left about an hour and a half after and we reached the village \(\cdot\) ikramajit by that train about ten in the morning. From the train itself when we were some eight to ten miles off, we could descry people from whole villages wending their way, in a long succession of rows, to the place of meeting From the station to that place was a distance of about a mile and a half. In the very centre of an extensive plain were fixed tents for guests to rest and for the assembly itself a shamiana (huge awning) had been put The report reached my ears that the terrible Bakri id (Cow) riots that had taken place the year previous in the district of Shahabad (Behar) started from this place. Valiatmaji was, therefore, this year specially invited here to see that no fresh breach of peaceful relations between Hindus and Mussalmans might occur The two volunteers that were accompanying us had given us to understand that the arrangement was that Mahatmaji's party should have their morning repast here about twelve noon But we noticed no efforts to give effect to the arrangement Indeed, we felt that there was a serious lack of effort in the matter of all arrangements. Our two volunteers were getting ready to prepare food for us, but we asked them not to trouble about it. Fearing that as strangers to the place we might attract a crowd about us, we repaired to some distance and sat under the shade of a big tree An open place all about us, this life of ours under tree-shade appealed to me intensely. But while we were enjoying our new life, the hours were slipping by Mahatmaji was to have arrived at 12, that hour had passed, and following it, the hours 1, 2, and 3, had also struck, and yet he had not put in an appearance. The people were getting too impatient and so they spent the hours witnessing horse-races at one place, or hearing speakers holding forth at another We too had got tired, what with having had to wait for hours together, what with a whole day's fast

The train for Sacaram had already left at 1-30 pm and no other train was available to either direction that day. Those among the people who had come to ottend the meeting from long distances either on foot or on horse back began to retrace their steps and the crowd that had cathered at the place of meeting was thinning in numbers. After a long time had thus passed all on a sadden we beliefd people who had gone back a long way across the level plain turn their paces and come running along towards the place of the meeting. This was the signal for the people here to give themselves up to a round of cheering Simultaneously we could just descry very far off two cars advancing towards us with oll speed amildst clouds of dust. Only a little while after Mahatmaji with the whole of his party arrived and straightway made for the place of meeting and communeed proceedings. With Mahatmaji our good friend Babu Ram Binode had come and met us under the tree kripalant for a brief while indulged in a lover's quarrel with him over the discomforts we had been put to. Our discursion then turned upon how we were to get to Sasaram Their thought turned to me specially for I was in weak health and had no food the whole of the day. They decided that they would get me occupy a sent to one of the cars then and there after which they would shift themselves as best as they could. If this arrangement excluded anybody it would be of no consequence. This decision brown been taken and before the incetting broke up I went and with their help got a sent 10 Maintmayl's car by the side of Mahatmaji s nephew Mr Jamnadas Gandhi

any speaker. The result was confusion all round, and the place itself was too hot by reason of the overcrowding. So many were there hanging about the two cars on every side. They would haidly heed any remonstrance, on the contrary the crowd pressed closer and closer. Babu Ram Binode and Professor Kripalani were hard put to it to protect us from the surging crowd. The nearer the time for the dispersal of the meeting the greater became the crowd that surrounded us. And thus thousands that had been to the meeting began converging towards the car, suspecting that it was the car which Mahatmaji was going to occupy.

Finding that the whole audience were making for this point, Mahatmaji got down from the platform the rear, but he had advanced only a few paces when a large throng besieged him, all anxious to offer him salutations of to touch his person I could hardly describe the confusion and tumult that ensued as thousands of people were making one simultaneous move The few volunteers that had been escorting towards him him got thoroughly exhausted with repeated efforts to keep back the advancing multitude. Then making a circle round Mahatmaji they took their stand under a mango tree But still wave after wave of seething mass made towards him, and it was hardly possible for the handful of volunteers to stem the tide. The cries of the volunteers and the uproar caused by the crowd drew our attention in the direction of Mahatmaji At that critical moment, finding no other alternative Ram Binode Babu ordered the driver to advance through the crowd unmindful of anything that might happen and make straight for where Mahatmaji was standing The repeated hooting of the horn startled

they rustic people and withdrawing from their positions little by little they made way for the car to cass. As soon as Ram Binode Babii and I having succeeded in forcing our way through the cro vd reached the soot under the mango tree we stretched out our hands towards Mahatmail who by holding them falt was able to jump into the car and take his seat. That in tant turning the course of the car round we drove forward with all speed in the direction of Sasaram. For a long Ion, distance the people came running after us as in one continuou tream. I noticed that Mahatmali had been hurr in some two or three places in his feet, and blood flowed out. I su pected that there must have been people in the crowd who had attempted to touch his person with their long sticks causing those burts. Even when seated in the car his eyes were not diverted anywhere. Once or twice I had turned my eyes towards him when I saw him deeply ingree ed in his own thoughts. On the way auddenly one of the lights in our car came down, and the car had to be brought to a tand. Then looking behind I saw a vast croad running towards us. In the neighbouring fields peasants had been at work but they left their work and came running to us. They bent their heads in salutation and with the words - Blessed are well Blessed are we!" on their lips they went on expressing their self gratulations

When about to enter a village we invariably found the villagers standing athwart our path and so presenting further progres. Though we would repeatedly wave our lands asking them to stand asking still they would not budge an inch to let the motor just through. Necessarily therefore the speed of the car had to be slowed down, when to the accompaniment of conch-shells and amidst joyous shouts of victory to Mahatma Gandhi would be showered upon our persons from all sides, flowers, small chips of cocoanut (Fruit) together, with fragrant substances and other articles of worship Having in this manner passed through a number of villages we came 'upon a place where the road traversed an open plain, and here the car was driven forward at a very high speed. Suddenly, however, after we had advanced but a short distance one of the tyres burst, and all of us came out of the car as the tyre had got to be renewed Then it was drizzling, and I was standing close by Mahatman on his left Just then an old lady holding an umbrella over her head, and supporting herself on a staff, approached towards me with slow steps and asked me the question,-"My son, who here is Mahatma Gandhi?" Standing as I did so near Mahatmaji, I constrained from saying that the person by my side was none other than Mahatma Gandhi, because I was feeling shy So I made no reply, but remained mute As she repeated her question, Mahatmaji himself put in the query—"Why should you be seeking him?" At this the old lady stepping forward said -"Sire, I am now one hundred and four and my sight lias grown dim I have visited the various holy places I have been to Badrikashram* In my own home I have dedicated two temples and made provision for the worship and maintenance of the Deity Just as we have had Ram and Krishna as Avatars, so also Mahatma Gandhi has appeared as an Avatar, I hear Until I have seen him death will not come to me " When she was speaking, tears suffused her eyes She had herself become now aware, without my telling her that the person she was speaking to was none other than Mahatma Gandhi himself So the next goestion that she put was-"Sire how could this desire or thirst (for things) be allayed? Mahatmaji nodding, smiled a little and said This desire yes it is impossible to get rid of our bondage so long as there is this desire this thirst for Then hearing that she was so very old Mahatman wanted to know what kind of food she took, etc. She began by saying that she had become a widow at twelve and since then she had been following a very aostere mode of life She described it all At the time in goestion she said that she had been subsisting on very little for her practice was to take only one symp made out of Durba grass during the day. Finding that the old lady was thus freely talking with Mahatmaji the eight or nine rustics who had in the interval gathered together informed us that she had been standing there at the very spot the whole of the day since early morning with the umbrella over her head with no other object than that of having a Dharshan * of Mahatma Gandhi She was now too old to be able to walk about. At that time we had been speeding along with the speed of an arrow and so if per chance the tyre had not burst at that very spot, she could hardly have noticed anything. Or if the tyre had burst at some little datance from the spot it would not have been possible for her to walk that distance and have a look at Mahatmaji. The tyre had burst only at a distance of four or five yards from where the had been standing. This coincidence of circumstances seemed indeed strange. Then the other car came up but the repairs had not yet been completed. Seeing that i.e. Ausnicious look.

Mahatmaji was standing outside and getting wet in the drizzle, Babu Rajendra Prasad came out of the second car and took his stand near Mahatmaji and finding me a new comer inquired about me with the query—"Brother, who are you?" In the meantime as the renewal of the tyre was getting delayed, Maulana Mahomed Ali Saheb called out and invited Mahatmaji to come and take his seat in the second car Mahatmaji went and sat there. But the road being too narrow at the spot, there was no room for the second car to pass along by our side, and so they also had to wait till our car was in working order.

When our car became fit for further journey, Professor Kripalani and two or three Mussalman gentlemen from the other car behind us came and got into it Mahatmaji chose to remain in the company of Maulana Mahomed Ali the two cars, ours was the bigger and faster Necessarily we left the other one far, far behind As before, so now also during our progress, as soon as we reached the outskirts of any village, offerings of fruits and flowers although meant for Mahatman were thrown into our car and we had to receive them People believed that Mahatmaji must be occupying our car, the first to arrive, and therefore they were all concentrating on it Professor Kripalani, Babu Ram Binode, and our other companions went on remarking that it was well that it should be so For in that way could all the persecution by these people be diverted on to our devoted heads and so spend itself out, and Mahatmaji would be given the opportunity to enjoy some little respite in this the last part of his motor journey

And so when nearing Sasaram, we saw that the whole of the town had come out, and were standing in a double

line some two or three miles loug. It was about sun down The crimson rays of the sun over spreading the jour quarters of the heaven lent but an air of uncommon loveliness to the whole scene At our very approach so many people began to dance in sheer joy. Then threading our way through this double row of people, with our ears invaded by continuous shouts of victory to Mahatma Gandhi we slowly advanced towards the city and as we udvanced the crowd grew larger and larger At length we reached near a Railway line. It was then time for a train to pass and the road across had been closed for the time being. Our car had to stop but that very instant the whole crowd from every side closed upon us. The pressure was so great that although we were inside the car we felt we were almost out of breath As we were some seven or eight in the car these people were hard put to it to discover which of us must be Mahatma Gandhi and in their perplexity some would be lightlug to clutch at the feet of kripalani some to clutch at the feet of Ram Binode -while others again would feel themselves best to have merely touched my person. And so group after group came as in a regular stream uor did they leave us until in the manner aforesaid they had had a look of us and a touch of our body. This simple faith of the people touched indeed the deepest chords of ones heart. But we had been fasting the whole day and had been soffering also from the fatigue of the journey to us this manifestation of love partook of the nature of love s tyranuy and seemed to be past endurance. Our suffering Indeed was very great but we reconciled ourselves to our fate with the thought that we were taking upon our own heads the trouble which it would have been Mahatmaji's lot to bear if he had been with us in the car. That he had been thus saved was to 'is some consolation in our misery

The train having passed, the road was opened and we lost time in re-starting our car, and soon we were at our quarters after having threaded our way through the narrow lanes and byelanes of Sasaram There too a large crowd had gathered but a strict guard had been kept at the gate A short while after, the second car arrived, bringing Mahatmaji, Maulana Mahomed Ali, Babu Rajendra Prasad and others

MEETING AND ACQUAINTANCE

Immediately after Mahatmaji s arrival goat s milk the usual food for Valintmaji was requisitioned. We were told that It had been sent for but had not arrived Jamoadas was quite opset at finding that it was not yet ready. Shortly after the milk came and after much hurrying to and fro it was warmed and got ready and brought before Mahatmaji. But he would not take it. Jamnadas looked pale in sorrow at this turn of events. I learnt that Mahatamaji had not had a morsel of food the whole day but had expressed a wish that he would have his meal at Sasaram. But the sum had gone down before the goat's milk could be got ready and it was his practice it was reported to me not to take anything after subset.

As soon as he had arrived the local leaders came and entered into conversation with him. But Mahatmajl was then thoroughly exhausted after the days a journey while on the top of it all had been the days fast. And there remained for him yet to address a public meeting at Sasaram. So just to give a little respite it was arranged to put off the meeting for two hours. The other gentlemen also took their leave. But ootside the noise was horrible. The room occupied by him had three or four doors facing the road and they had all to be closed. But such a crowd had assembled there and been making such oolse that ooe suspected that the doors might be broken open any moment. I was standing at a corner of the room. Mahatmaji noticed me, and by a motion of his his fingers called my attention to a lamp at a distance. I thought he was asking me to turn down the wick a bit to enjoy greater repose. But the fact was otherwise, he wanted the light for his use. As soon as I grasped his meaning I took the lamp and placed it before him. That instant he took out his paper from his portfolio and fell to work.

It was for the first time now that he gave me something to do by way of direction Before this when the tyre had burst and he was talking to the old lady, his attention had been in the first instance drawn to me as a new comer who had been travelling in his company. I thought that as he had seen me before as one of the company, he was prompted to give me the direction Otherwise, as I could see from my experience during these two days, it was not his practice to ask a stranger or a new-comer to do his bidding. Seeing him intent on work, I left the room for the verandah outside Returning shortly after I found him gently discussing something with Mr Kripalani The moment Kripalaniji saw me, he broke out-"Is there any dearth of men? Here's Krishnadas, for instance, who, if you could but persuade him, could very well manage your work" Mahatmaji replied, "How shall I take away from you your man and let your work suffer?" Kripalaniji answeied-"He is not one of my men" Then Mahatmaji began by questioning Kripalaniji about me After a brief exchange of words with the Professor, and without questioning me at all, Mahatmaji came to the decision to send me out to Ahmedabad as Assistant Editor to Young India He then informed Krıpalanıjı that to relieve me of all worry and put me also on the way to learn the work, he would send down Mr

Mahadeo Desai from Allahabad to Ahmedabad instructing him to be there for two to three months. Kriplaniji saud, If Krishnadas goes there would be no further need of sending Mahadeo. Mahatmaji had already risen from his seat to go and have a wash. But when he heard Kriplaniji speak those words his face beamed with pleasure and he broke out with the remark. Indeed 1. Then with a motion of his fingers pointing at me he exclaimed, 'Then certainly you will have to join me?

I was simply astounded at this happening. Ny teacher had definitely warned me against joining Mahatmaji in his tours lest I should be caught in a whirl of work. For I was then in a such a weak state of health that it was out of the question for me to undertake any responsible work. But look at what has happened! It was out of my regard for Professorii that I had agreed to come here to Sasaram while tunity to get introduced to Mahatmaji but I had willingly declined it. But now be himself, had come forward to talk to me, and he not merely talked to me but he would have me undertake u responsibility for him and leave for Ahmedabad for the purpose | Feeling the oppressive strain of such thoughts I came out of Mahatmail's room as soon as he had left for the wash, and threw myself in an arm chair on the verandali, and gave myself up to endless speculation Coming across Professorji I remonstrated with him for his having thrown me into such an embarrassing I tried also to bring home to him how utterly impracticable his proposal was but he gave no heed to any word. On the contrary he tried to bring me round by saying that it was absolutely necessary that I should go that if I could by ever so little bring down the burden of Mahatmaji's worries, it would be no small service done to the country. Finding that it was useless to go on arguing with Professorji, I proposed to him that I should myself go and frankly state before Mahatmaji all my difficulties, and that I may be enabled to do so I made the request that Professorji should help me by a ranging for an interview

Soon, after, I was sent for Entering Mahatmaji's room I found that every body else was sent away, and that Mahatman himself was waiting, so it appeared to me, in an attitude of eager expectancy to hear what I might have to I lost no time in telling him that I was already engaged in rendering service to my teacher at Benares, that he had grown old, and that it was not for me to leave him and go elsewhere Here Professorii interposing made light of my objection. He said that he himself would take the burden of the work on his shoulders . After this, of course, I could not press my point with the same force Mahatmaji now suggested that he himself was ready and willing to write to my teacher, Mr Mukerji, and get his views all these proposals, I thought I must clear my position further by raising some other points. I pointed out that Professorji cherished an affectionate liking for me and therefore was led to form an exaggerated view of my powers. In truth, my capacities were far less than what he had imagin-Further, having never associated nor worked with Mahatmaji, I was hardly in a position to understand his point of view. Therefore, for me to go to Ahmedabad to take up a new responsibility neither attracted me, nor was it a source of encouragement for me At this Mahatmaji said that I need not worry over all that, Mahadeo would come and set me on the way And he went on to speak at length in lligh praise of Mr Mahadeo Desal. He then proceeded to explain that the movement of the spirit which he wanted to inaugurate in the country was undoubtedly based on old Indian ideals uevertheless it was his intention to give It a new orientation. Therefore to understand his point of view required a little penetrative insight, and his words must have to be scanned accordingly. And so he went on explaining many things about his message. Every single objection of mine was thus rendered of no effect. He on whom was rivetted the gaze of India and before the power of whose resplendent spirituality cowered the spirit of the mighty British Government was it for me to carry on a war of words with such a personality? I was feeling ashamed even to think of opposing his wishes any further and so I said nothing further By this time Maulaoa Mahamed Ali came to urge Mahatmaji to start for the meeting Mahatmaji was instantly oo his legs While leaving he left word with Professor Kripalani that I should also attend the meeting

It was then ten at night. We had not even then had our meal. Further the whole of the day I had been starving and then there was the great strain to which I was subjected on account of the crowd at so many different places. The result was that I was thoroughly knocked up Bnt I had no choice left to me when I learnt he had left instructions that I must attend the meeting. So in the company of Kripaliniji and Babu Binode I came to the place of the meeting. The entrance by which one passed to the platform had then been closed. The crowd hanging about the gate was too great. We succeeded in making our way through the crowd and the gate was mistantly opened for us, but considerable numbers entered in our wake, which led to much pushing and jostling about Professorji and Ram Binode Babu instantly got upon the platform, but for myself, partly out of shyness, and partly because of pressure about me I 'was delaying. Meanwhile the volunteers having failed to cope with the crowd, a free fight began, and a few blows also fell on my back. Noticing this Maulana Mahomed Ali called out to me with the words, "Don't be so slow, man," and reaching out his hand pulled me up on to the platform

It was a huge gathering, no less than twenty thousand people must have assembled in front of us. On the platform, besides Mahatmaji and Maulana Mahomed Ali, I noticed a few provincial leaders of Behar. Babu Rejendra Prasad spoke first according welcome, and was followed by Mahatmaji. Next Maulana Mahomed Ali spoke. It was then past eleven. It was not possible for me to hear any of these speeches with anything like attention. There was gnawing hunger at the stomach, there was the heaviness of sleep in the eyes, while the body itself was ready to droop through exhaustion. At this point Kripalaniji and Rain Binode Babu expressed by a gesture their desire to leave the meeting. I assented, and then we three quietly got down from the platform and returned to our quarters.

We had our meal after which I went to bed. After a short spell of sleep I awoke and saw Mahatmaji just returning from the meeting. He took his seat on a cot just mear me and as soon as the bed was made ready for him, the lay down on it. He was so exhausted, at intervals I heard him sighing heavily and reciting the words, "Shree Ram, Shree Ram"

I rose at an early hour before dawn and finishing ablution got myself ready. Mahatmall also rose, and when he had finished washing hands and mouth breakfast was placed before him. His nieal over he handed up to me the saucer the mill -cup and the spoon to scour and clean There was as many people about longing to serve him even in that humble way. I was a net comer whose acquaintance with him was but one day old. But even so he had looked upon me as one so closely related that he had unliesifatingly asked me to clean his uten ils I felt extremely happy When I had done the cleansing he called me again and handing to men paper and pencil asked me to write out in English a report of his previous night's speech. I had listened to that speech half asleep. Moreover since early in the morning a howline crowd was waiting nutside Neither was my brain cool. In the circumstances I did not know whether I could at all reproduce the speech. I felt also that I must lose no time to go back to Benares and to report to Mr Mukerji my teacher previous evening s proposals. A train for Benares was to leave at 8-30 AM So I saw Mahatmaji again and expressed my wish to leave by that train I told him that I proposed to write out the speech while travelling and If my teacher agreed to come back and meet him at Patna three days later

He readily give his consent to my proposals but he asked me to put to my teacher three questions on his be half. Firstly, whether he thought I had the requisite qualification for the work in question secondly whether he would accord me his permission and thirdly if he gave me his permission, whether I should have blessings also. Then Mahatmaji asked if it was well that he should send through me a letter to my teacher I said it was not necessary. Then snatching a hasty breakfast, and before starting for the station, I again went into his presence to take my leave. I saw him very busy at that time over many things, and discussing matters, but he gave me a gracious look and bade me good bye. Before parting he repeated his request that I must not forget to write out a report of his Sasaram speech. Though it was only a single day's acquaintance yet he treated me so cordially that I took courage for the first time now to touch his feet by way of obeisance.

CHAPTER V

A DAY AT PATYA

I took the 8-30 train from Sasaram and reached Benares the same day about I P.M. In the traih I wrote out a report of Mahatmaji s Sasaram address. My teacher was surprised to see me back at Benares so unexpectedly For I had written to him from Allahabad that I would stay there for a whole week and he was quite in the dark as to all that had happened on my account meanwhile. The moment he saw me he expressed his surprise that in the course of those three days I should be looking so improved. Then after recounting do him the extreme hardships and the surprising experiences of the previous day. I placed before him Mahatmaji s proposal. I was a little surprised to find that he so readily agreed to it.

Before his appreliension had been that my health might break down if I accompanied Mahatmaji in his tour but when he found that notwidestanding the strain of the last two days. I was looking all the better that apprehen sion was removed.

Looking at all sides of the question my teacher came to the conclusion that as between going to Ahmedahad to undertake the responsibility of lenne India and staying with Mahatmaji if possible within view to have opportunities of serving him personally the latter was the better course being more conductive to my welfare. My teacher impressed upon me that the Impurities of a man's character were removed by nothing so easily as by devoted personal service.

to a purified soul. He explained that it was a matter of general experience that whenever a person came under the influence of any particular type of association, that association would leave an impress upon his character That is why we find the high virtues of association with pure souls recounted in our scriptures. Mahatmaji in his view was the very-image of purity, for in his opinion Mahatmaji not merely preached Ahimsa (nonviolence) by word of mouth, but he had made it also a part of his own life Again, said he, the wider acceptance by the world at large of Alumsa as an active principle of life would have undoubtedly the effect of allaying the general unrest But not merely that, for the individual who would advance on the path of spirituality, the first step would be to learn the lesson of Ahimsa If forgetting my petty self. I could devote myself to the service of such a great soul as Mahatman my life would soon grow in purity This he repeatedly sought to impress upon me

He next explained to me that, spiritually speaking we see reflected in the world outside only a picture of the inner condition of our lives. If our hearts are shrouded in the darkness of untruth, then in the world outside the light of truth hardly shines for us. If inside ourselves there is violence, malice and pride of self rampant, we would see nothing but the play of violence, malice and pride in the world outside. Therefore, in order to see the world in a pure and truthful perspective, the attainment of purity of heart by means of self-purification, becomes essential. Wanting in such purity of heart each one of us walks about as a very centre of disharmony, and in the place of harmony scatters about the flames of hate and strife. If such weakness of character have got to be eradicated it in fact the Satan within us must be exorcised association with and devoted service to a great soul is a far easier means of achieving success than fighting sigle-handed with one sown evil nature

Thus with his permission and his benedictions I left Benares on the 15th Angust and reached Patna early uext morning Mahatmajl's three questions my teacher answered in a letter to Professor Kripalani. In that letter my teacher said that he did not think that I should be found wanting for the particular kind of work that Mahatmaji wished me to uadertake. Further he said that he would cheerfully send me out ou any errand of duty prescribed by Mahatmaji Nevertheless he desired to express the opinion that if I must fulfil the real need of my life. I must seek to develop the non-violent side of my character. Hence, if instead of seeding me to Ahmedabad Mahatmaji should be pleased to seeding me closely associated with him as a personal attendant, then alone should he thought my highest interests be subserved.

I got down at the Patna station and enquired of a porter where Mahatmaji was putting up Carrying my luggage on his head he took me to the Natioual School premises a few minutes walk from the station I met Ram Benode Babu there and learnt from him that Mahatmaji was then staying at the Sadakai Ashram a distance of four miles from the town. Shortly after a messenger from the Ashram came and m a state of hinry looked about for me and finding me he made haste to inform me that the Working Committee was going to sit at eight in the morning and it was Mahatmaji s wish that if possible I could come and see him before the meeting Forthwith a carriage was sent for and he left with me But it was then close upon eight, and so there was not the least likelihood of our reaching the place before the hour fixed for the meeting

I reached the Sadakat Aslıram when it was very nearly nine On the outskirts of the town, on a bank of the Ganges and in the midst of a garden, the Ashram stood. It was then the very height of the runy season and the river was in full flood overflowing the bank on either side. Inside the Ashram itself I noticed ample equipment for work Buildings were in course of construction, there were spinning wheels in working order, and handloom factories and so on. On a verandah on the backside of a cottage, Mahatmaji was sitting, and a meeting of the Working Committee was in progress Inside the cottage none but intimates were admitted Immediately on my arrival, Professor Kripalani cordially welcomed me and took me inside. Mahatmaji being there, there was a constant throng of people about the place in spite of the rains and wet weather, groups of country-women following each other in succession would be seen making a circuit from behind the cottage, and then, they would stand at some distance from the verandah, have a view of Mahatmaji, and then having offered him salutation would retire

As soon as I had taken my seat, Kripalaniji wanted to know what was the decision I had arrived at By way of answer, I read out my teacher's letter. When I had finished reading he told me that Mahatmaji himself had come to the decision that he would take me along with him, instead of sending me out to Ahmedabad. Thus he said my teacher's request had already been granted. The newstook me by surprise.

It was one O clock and the Working Committee was still sitting. Up till then I could not present myself before Mahatmaji. I took my meal at the Ashram itself. Among the Committee were Pandit Motilal Nebru and Manlana Mahomed Ali. I saw also the Congress Treasurer the noted Marwan leader Seth Jamnalal Bajaj. High in stature speaking in a lond voice be could gain the ear of the committee by his emphatic and pointed manner of speech. There I noticed also Maulana Mazrul Haque the founder and soul of the Sadakat Ashram. His hair and his beard had all turned silvery with age. That he ever had lived the life of an England returned barrister could not be traced even in the faintest way in his lineaments, or his garments. He had cultivated long beard, and he looked the very picture of an old world Mahomedan patnarch.

Heavy rains had fallen overnight and the whole of the morning with intervals of intermission it was drizzling Thus, in many places the Ashram was under water and moving about became irksome. Here for the first time I saw a meeting of the Working Committee In those days of August 1921 the tide of enthusiasm for Swarai among the people at large had risen to its full height, and all had been working heart and son! Vo one doubted but that Swarai was near at hand Then each single decision of the Congress Executive was receiving at the hands of the people greater honour than even the laws of the Government. If Swarai was won then this very Working Committee would function as the Government of India And seeing the same Committee holding its meeting in this cottage amidst such humble surroundings and slash and water an enchanting picture of Swaral that was to be unfolded itself before my

can come along with me As to the future, we can decide that afterwards "Thus did he make me one of his own party Our business with him having come to an end, we took leave of him and came inside the cottage Professor Kripalani in sheel joy went on telling me that no longer should I keep myself in the background out of shyness, but that I must make bold to come forward and walk ahead in a crowd Otherwise, I should get buried among a sea of heads By long association with Mahatmaji, he had acquired considerable experience in this sort of matter. Undoubtedly, I must make all necessary efforts to keep pace with what was required of me in my present environment, but I was not quite sure whether I was fitted by character for the kind of ready action which was necessary if I must march ahead of a crowd

Presently the order for our departure came. From the Ashram, we must first go to the National School, from there Mahatmaji would go and attend a public meeting. Then towards evening we must leave for Calcutta by the Punjab Mail

In company with Professor Kripalani I came to the National school before Mahatmaji arrived I found the whole of the school premises filled with people. As soon as a car was sighted, they sent up loud cries of joy Mahatmaji was not in our car, but we were greeted with the same cheers. One ascetic, in particular, whose whole body was besmeared with ashes lay down at full length on the ground, face downwards, with a view to give us salutations, and went on repeating this process of salutation, as if performing a sort of physical exercise. When after this Mahatmaji arrived, the enthusiasm of the people knew to bounds. It is strange that his presence in a crowd should work such sudden transformation of character. But as for himself he would retain his imperturbable gravity and would not look one way or another but with steady rersistent attention would go on doing his own work. When le arrived with rapid steps he made straight for the apart ment reserved for him and took his seat on a carpet. There the whole crowd hesieged him. So to upproach him became a matter of extreme difficults Even in the midst of this crowd the Working Committee had a second sitting Supporting himself on his left cloow and reclining against a pillov he sat looking calm and composed Pandit Motifalii was placing before Mahatmaji one proposal after another and was asking him for his views on each. The answers he gave were wholly devoid of parade or of wordy ingenuity He would not utter a single word beyond what was absolutely necessary Such was the manner in which the business of the meeting was being transacted. But there were people among the crowd clever at talk and sufficiently forward who would make their way to Mahatmais and out him all sorts of desultory questions. To these also he gave suitable answers But when these people would thus by way of talk monopolise Mahatmaji Pandr Motilalji would come forward and put a stop to such talk, and get the business of the meeting done. I was sitting behind Mahatmali and for a long time was watching these going on But having been in the crowd for so long my nerves were getting restless. So I rose and sought rest in another room. In the meantime the business of the Working Committee having been finished it was time for Mahatmaji to leave for the public meeting. He now summoned me and began to enquire in detail about the things I cairied with me, and whether I stood in need of anything else I told him that I had all that I wanted then directed me to proceed straight from the school to the Railway station He on his part was preparing to leave but the stream of questions from the people around was It seemed as if people's business with Mahatmay In the midst of this hurly-burly, he had had no ending remembered me and given me instructions betimes to proceed to the station Since my interview with him Sadakat Ashram, I had no further opportunity of meeting He was always so very busy that he had not a noto spare, nor was it necessary for me, having no particular business of my own, to approach him without his asking me, I would have myself gone to the But being a new man, I might commit station in time mistakes, and therefore he had kept in mind that little item of instruction

Presently Mahatmaji left for the public meeting, the crowded fair of a gathering at the school premises melted away. All outside people having departed, we of his party, as well as belonging to those of the other leaders, prepared to leave for the station. Towards evening, Professor Kripalani, Ram Benode Babu, and a number of other friends came to the station to see me off. There was a huge concourse of people there, and everybody was in mortal hurry to get in. As the tiain was about to stait I managed to get in somewhere. Till then, I had always taken shelter, behind Professor Kripalani and had been nuised by his loving care and attention. But now I must learn to do without him and stand wholly on my own feet. The new associates were all strangers to me. Never before had I gone out into the world.

like this. I was wholly in the dark as to where and why I was being led away under God's providence. And so I felt sorely troubled at heart, but the fact that I was going in the company of such a great soul as Wahatma Gandhi infused hope in me and buoyed me up.

CHAPTER IV

EN ROUTE TO ASSAM

We reached 'Calcutta 'on the morning of the 17th August Babu Shyam Sundai Chakravaithy, Babu Jitendralal Banerii, and other well-known Bengali leaders come to the Lilova station to welcome Mahatmaji The old familiar sights and scenes met my eyes everywhere Mahatmaji was now Bengal's guest Being one of his party, I also felt as if I had got transformed into one of her guests, and so the old familiar sights had begun to wear altogether a new appearance At the Howrah station a large crowd had assembled in front of Mahatman's compartment thought once crossed my mind that I'would do well to go and see him, if only to make him aware that I was there as one of his party. But the pressure of the crowd was too great for my strength At last I betook myself to a distant corner of the platform As soon as the train came to a stop the passengers all got down, and hurried to and fro to leave for their respective destinations. I had no idea where to go, nor had I been informed about it before. Nor was Professor Kripalani near at hand to make things smooth for Thus it was that amidst so much active preparation going on all around, I alone stood passive and inactive By this time Mahatmaji had got down from the train and had left surrounded by a huge concourse of people there debating what to do, a Guzarati gentleman of Calcutta discovered me Mahatmaji had given him instructions to week me out - I saw that although I might have remained inactive he had oot forgotten about me

As Mr C.R Das was then away from Calcutta we ac cepted that day the hospitality of his sister Mrs Urmila Devi

We were to leave for Assam by the Darjiling Mail at five O Clock. Maintmaji left etaly as he had to address a public meeting in Mirzapur Park. We did not attend the meeting but made straight for the Sealdah station with the whole of our lugrage

We were a big party bound for Assam Besides Mahatmaji amoog the leaders were Maulana Mahomed Ali Begum Mahomad Ali Maulana Azad Sabhanl and Seth Jamnalal Bajaj. With each one of them there were some two or three others forming his party. Besides there were so many other people from Calcutta who were all accompanying us in our journey. On Mahatmaji's personal staff there was besides Jamnadas and myself a youth by name Prabbodas. On him lay the duty of ministering to Mahatmaji's bodily wants and comforts. In the Darjiling mail we two occupied the same compartment and Hearnt from him that he was a son of a nephew of Mahatmaji's. I could understand even from a brief intercourse with him that Prablindas was an open hearted soul

About ten in the oight we arrived at Santahar and changing train made ourselves comfortable in the Assam mail. The crowd here was as great as it had been every where else. But here we did not meet with much noise and confusion. Mahatmaji had then taken to his bed, bot he saw me and at once called me by name. Then on my approaching him he enquired if I had got acquainted with Mrs. Urmila Devi When I answered. No his felt surprised.

Then like a near and dear one, he began to put to me various questions. He conquired how old I was, whether I had parents living, in what college I had been educated, what particular books I had studied, and so on. When I told him that I had not read at any College, his countenance beamed, and he showed an eagerness to learn about the particular system of education I had followed. In a few short words I tried to explain my teacher's method of training. But just then a few visitors came in and interfered with the course of our conversation. Mahatmaji could not, therefore, proceed further

On the morrow, we had reached the borders of Assam, where one of the Assamese leaders, Mr Nabin Chandra Bardoloi, had arrived to accord Mahatmaji a warm welcome and escort him. At every station at which the mail had to stop, we met a huge concourse of people and at every station in front of the office 100m a raised platform was improvised to serve as a dais. As requested by Mr. Baidoloi, Mahatmaji would alight from the train to receive the welcome of the people The moment he got down, the entire body of people forming the crowd would point towards him with their fingers and go on crying- 'lo' lo' there! they would be busy only with seeing him, and so in a number of places as the crowd could not be silenced, he had to return to his compartment without addressing them. I had been near him since early morning I saw that he was ever busy with his own work. Not a single unnecessary word, would escape his lips, nor would he join in the talk of other people When he felt the fatigue of work, he would close his eyes and he down and be silent for a while Then he would perhaps suddenly get up and resume writing On account of the loog railway journey and the perpetual ooise, and bastle all of us were feeling more or less fatigued. He excepted all of us were spending our time in idle talk, or to looking at outside objects and scenes from our train. He alooe uttered oot a word nor would be torn instaltention to anything outside his own work.

About 11 30 a.m we reached Amingson Station where we were to leave the train and cross the Brahmanutra by steamer. On the opposite bank was the Pandu station. and from there we were to motor to Gaubate. That was the arrangement. As soon as we boarded the steamer Mahatmaji sent for me and hunded me a bundle of issues of the Servant (newspaper) I was required to find out and make cuttings for him of the Four Letters on Non cooperation by Mr Andrews which had appeared therein. The steamer was overcrowded, the entire body of inssengers from the train was there, and there was hardly standing room anywhere. He was then eogaged in a most friendly clint with a Eurasian couple from Chittagong who having learnt that Mahatmaji was on board the steamer had come to pay him their respects. He was asking them about their home and about the joys and sorrows of their daily lives. They were simply overpowered by Mahatmaji's kindness and were returning him thacks at almost every other word from his lips. Since early morning Gandhill had been looking austerels culm and collected It seemed as if his whole mind was rivetted to something internal his whole look pointing inwards and therefore on the ootside there was not observable the usual brightness of appearance. Bot for the moment I found him an altogether different character Now he had become the incarnation of the spirit of delight and his talk and laughter radiated joy on every side, and captured the hearts of the people around him

Meanwhile, Maulana Mahomed Ali seeing an English girl before him was busy telling her a story. The gist of the story was that in India at the time, there lived two brothers possessing huge bodies who were extremely vicious by They would cat up living men and women, character and if they came across a girl like her, they would swallow her at one gulp. Then telling her that of the two brothers he was one, he burst out laughing. The girl perceiving the humout of the story shyly laughed, as much as to say that she understood that he had been telling a false story. Then the Maulana Saheb narrated to Mahatmaji the story of au English lady who had been travelling in the same compartment with him and who from her reading of the Englishman and other papers had imbibed a queer impression about the Ali brothers But when the became acquainted with him in the train and came to find that he was one of the two brothers her surprise knew no bounds and she had to confess how sadly mistaken she had been. Thenceforward from a bitter enemy of Non-co-operation, she had turned into a sympathiser. I had no experience of Maulana Shaukat Ali, but from what I had seen of Mahomed Ali it was clear that his very simplicity was bound to capture one's heart The style of his talk, his loud, hearty laugh, and the forcefulness of his character were all the expression of a unique personality

When the steamer reached Pandu station, and I saw the immense crowd there, I was afraid lest I should be left behind Everyone else of our party, whether Guzarati, Mahratti, Mai wari or Moslem, could be distinguished by his dress or his cap but I was a Bengah bare-headed like the Assamese with nothing to distroguish me about the dress. I felt that it might therefore be difficult for the people to make out that I formed one of Mahatmajl's party. With this thought in mind I did not wait there but made straight for the car reserved for Mahatmajl and took my seat there in the company of Prabhndas. Large bodies of people had come all the way from Gauhati to welcome Mahatmajl and the well known leader of Assam. Wr. T. Phookan was in this car escorting Mahatmaji.

At Gaubati Mahatman stayed at Mi Tarun Ram Phookan's place In front of his residence was a wide extended open lawn where not less than fifty thousand people could assemble in meeting. Beyond, was the public road, and further beyond was the river Brahma-The whole lawn had been fenced round to keep back the crowd who might otherwise have invaded our quarters and troubled Mahatmaji. At short intervals in the fence, arches had been put up, where night and day volunteers kept guard This, of course, kept the crowd out, but the workers who had assembled from all the different parts of Assam to invite Mahatmaji to their respective towns formed a goodly crowd by themselves Thus not for one moment was rest or peace to be found The incessant noise almost drove one mad I wondered how long we should be able at all to stand the strain of such noise after the fatigue and exhaustion of our previous journey

On the maidan in front of our residence a public meeting was held in the evening. According to my estimate some twenty five thousand people must have assembled there. A little to the right of Mahatinaji's room was put up a raised platform for the accommodation of the leaders. I was there for a short while to listen to Mahatinaji's speech. I soon returned and watched the proceedings from our house. Mahatinaji's speech was rendered into the Assamese language by Mr. Phooken. About 9 P.M. the meeting was dissolved but the moment before. Mahatman speaking for a second time made a feeling appeal to the assembly as follows - What special object had they in inviting and briaging him to such a distant part of the country as this? Would they content themselves with merely hearing him speak and then quietly return to their homes? Or was it their object to allay his heart & agony by helping him in redressing the Ponjab and Khilafat wrongs and in the winning of Swaraj or Freedom for Jadia? If indeed they had come merely to hear him speak he begged them all with clasped hands not to trouble him further, but permit him to go back. When this part of the speech was explained by Mr. Phookan to the whole andlence of Assamese in wonder ful scene followed. For the space of a whole minute almost the rlace was stilled into complete silence. The minds of all seemed to have for a moment become rivetted to one single thought, and the whole audience was moved by a singualr unanimity of feeling. When in a river the flood tide comes closely following upon the ebb tide then for a time the current flows neither was and there is perfect calm hut the next moment with a roar comes the flood sweeping everything before it. Much like this was the scene that followed at the meeting. When the full meaning of Mahatmaii's appeal dawned upon them the whole audience after a momentary pause with one voice broke out into a thundering roar saying- No No that must never be, we can never allow you to leave us and go back in the way He would presently test the genuineness of their enthusiasm said Mahatmali rejolaing they longed for Swaral and if their anxiety to take him to the other places of Assam was at all sincere let them crowding round him that if per chance he could snatch a few moments of spare time he would spend them wholly on his work of reading and writing One is simply amazed to find how in the midst of all this coofusion be could keep his head cool and get through the prescribed course of his work. Under such circumstances ordinary people would go mad Wheo after such incessant work he would be left alone for a while I would not come near him for fear of disturbing bum. That is why I had refrained from placing before bim those articles on the day previous nor had he himself asked for them. My belief is that having given an order to anybody he would not put pressure upon him bot woold patiently wait and see whether the instruction was actually carried out. He would it appeared to me text people's sense of responsibility by noting whether the work was got through smoothly enough. That morning once or twice I had seen him perusing the report I had prepared of his Sasaram speech. He could hardly have finished reading it for ufter every two or three lines of reading visitor after visitor came and caused interruption. Since morning he had gone oot oo three or four occasions attend ing different meetings. There was the meeting of the Marwari merchants another of Assamese ladies and a third of Bengali ladies.

During our secood day's stay at Ganhati late in the afternoon another huge meeting was held on the same maidao. His speech over Mahatmaji quickly returned to partake of his meal for it was his practice to take nothing after sunset. As oeither Jamnadas nor Prabhudas was at home at the time he called me and asked me to get his meal ready. The meal over he again went out, having given me instructions to keep hot water ready, and the other things necessary for his evening bath. When about to depart, he asked me to write out a report of the speech he had just delivered for submission to him. When I enquired if it was to be a lengthy one, he said that a brief report might do, but it was necessary that all important matters and ideas shall be incorporated in it.

In that speech of his he had replied to the various letters he had received from many educated Assamese in which they had given expresion to their regret that in his "Hind Swaraj", or "Indian Home Rule" he had treated. the Assamese as belonging to the same category as the Bhils, Pindaris and Thugs, and other such wild tribes Mahatman said that the book had been composed in 1908 during his sojourn in England Till then he had not come in contact with any native of Assam, not had he then any first hand knowledge of the country, His knowledge of Assam had, in fact, been derived from one or two English books From a study of these books he had been led to infer that Assam had not evolved any sort of civilisation Now, however, having seen Assam with his own eyes, he had realised his mistake. He further explained that in his book, he had said nothing which was intended to cast aspersions upon the people of Assam The English people had claimed that the reclamation of the uncivilised races of India was their exclusive work. In going to refute that allegation, for want of a first-hand knowledge, and echoing merely the statements of the English themselves, he had cited the case of the Assamese people in the particular manner to which objection had been taken

further heard but on the morning of the day on which Mahatmaji left Gauhati some ancient relics of Assamese civilisation and culture were produced before him. A certain antiquarian scholar showed him a unmber of ancient works in manuscript composed in the Assamese language One of these was a work relating to elephant lore which was interesting to a degree and wholly novel in character Elephants were classified under varions types, and each such type was described at length while recourse was had to pictorial illustrations for the porpose of expounding its special features. The analysis and investigation of the subject were carried out with such a minute nicety as to excite wonder. Then we saw the Assamese translations of the Ramayana and the Mahabharata. These were perhaps older than the Bengah translations Then we saw some old beautifully woven specimens of Assamese cloth, as old as a hundred years but were so well preserved as to look quite fresh. Next we were shown how yarns for the famous Assumese cloth known as Ends muga was produced Every home in Assam has a handloom of its own and the women of Assam are all expert weavers. In fact, no girl could be given in marriage unless she knew weaving. In Barrister Mr Phockan's home also we found two looms, and a little girl gave a demonstration on them. No more oral description could ever have given us such idea of what Assamese civilisation was like as their ocular demonstration. Instead therefore of attempting to establish the claim of their own culture by mere word of month, the Assam leaders did well to produce these visible evidences and by so dring were able the more easily to enlist Mahatman a sympathles on behalf of their own province

Assam has many close points of contact with Eastern Bengal. It seemed to me that the soil and crops of Assam, her mighty rivers, and the manners and habits of her people, bore no small resemblance to those of Eastern Bengal. The vernacular of Assam is now being recognised as a distinct language, and the educated classes of the Province in their anxiety to preserve their separate entity, have been latterly paying the deference and homage due to whatever is peculiarly Assamese. But to me it appeared that Assamese had much in common with the spoken language of Eastern Bengal, the difference in script being negligible. The food of the people of Eastern Bengal and that of the Assamese, together with the respective modes of their preparation, were all more or less the same. At least my experience at Gauhati pointed to that conclusion.

CHAPTER VIII

Leaving Gauhati by steamer at 2 p m on the 20th August Mahatmaji arrived at Tezpur on the morning of the 21st. The whole uight was thus spent on board the steamer The natural aights and scenes that met our eyes on the way were fascinating to a degree. Under the shadow of encompassing hills green with verdure the mighty Brahmaputra pursued its course to its far distant goal like a meandering sheet of white cloth girdling the waist of some unknown God. From the river itself rose at intervals hillocks like so many islands. Pointing to two such hillocks near Ganhati, an Assamese friend told me that many foreign travellers adjudged that landscape as superior even to some of the world renowned laudscapes of Switzerland Whereever we turned our eyes we were enchanted by the green loveliness of the scenery We were a large growd on board the steamer for Mahatmali s following was now swelled by people from the Province itself As I had not yet been able to write out his Gauhati speech I sought a secluded corner in the steamer and tried to write. But I was not left to myself for long Seeing that I was going with Mahatmaji, and that what was more I was writing something the crowd out of sheer curiosity pursued me wherever I went Finding that nothing could be done under the circumstances I had to give up the attempt. Standing near Mahatmail for some time in the evening I heard him conversion quite cheerfully Fascinated by the beauty of nature around him, he had forgotten his austere devotion to work, and had assumed a natural attitude

Getting up early in the morning, we found ourselves enveloped in a dense, impenetrable mist. But, as the captain knew by experience that Tezpur could not be far off, the steamer was slowed down, lest by mistake we should go ahead leaving Tezpur behind. Then groping our way through the mist, we at last reached Tezpur. By that time a heavy rain had began to fall, but its fury soon abated, and it had completely ceased by the time we reached our quarters.

After taking some rest Mahatmaji sent for me and asked me to copy some English letters that he had written Not being able to follow his hand-writing correctly, I went wrong in making out two words and had to be corrected It was only after some practice that one could learn to read his hand I had not yet been able to give him the Gaubati speech, as I found it very difficult to concentrate my mind on the work in the midst of all that crowd and disturbance As that speech had not yet been finished, I did not attend the meeting at Tezpur, lest the two speeches should get mixed up in my mind, and I should make a mess of my Gauhati report Before going to the meeting Mahatmaji motored to a tea-garden at some distance from I heard that the meeting was a splendid one, the town Mahatmaji's speech being particularly impressive and moving I heard high praise of the masterly manner in which Mr Phooken had translated this speech His ability in this respect was, indeed, wonderful As soon as Mahatmaji would conclude his speech, Mr Phooken would get up, and without a moment's thought, would render the whole speech word for word into Assamese. It was as though he forgot for the moment his individuality, and merged himself in Mahatmaji s for he would accurately reproduce every single argument advanced by Mahatmaji. It is astonishing that he should not omit a single thought of the original. Yet he gave out the translation in such an easy unpremeditated manner with not even a single emphasis misplaced that it seemed to the hearers as if it was an original speech and not a translation

The public meeting was followed by a couple of small special meetings, after which Mahatmaji took to silence the morrow being Monday his day of silence. The silence would last for just 24 hours from Sunday night to Monday night On that day he would not talk to anybody or do any out side work he would not even travel on that day if he could help it. During this period of weekly silence he was accustomed to write articles for Young India and Navannas or sometimes reply to his correspondence. During silence if he had to question anybody or say anything he would write Whenever he wanted to call us he would strike something with the pencil in his hand and we would run up to him He would also spend long hours in lying down I never saw him praying in the orthodox fashion but I believe that he spent his Mondays as far as possible in silent prayer No strangers were admitted into his presence on that day of silence except in case of special need and even those who were on his staff respected his silence going about as softly as possible and talking in whispers. For this reason on Mondays alone there was a bill in the usual hubbub and we could enjoy some peace to write out the Gauhati speech I was unable to write out a short report like what we have in newspapers effort to preserve all the details of the speech my report had become long. The silence being broken in the evening, I went and handed in my report to him. He took it with great pleasure, and said that before his weekly articles for "Young India" were despatched, I must make it a point to He said that day he had sent an article of two columns on National Education He expressed the opinion that I could better enter into the spirit of an article by reading it in manuscript than in print. In that way I should be able more easily to decipher his handwriting. I informed him that not having been able to write out his Gauhati speech by that time, I had not attended the meeting at He said it was not the proper thing to have done I must hear everyone of his speeclies, as he never found time to give separate instruction to anybody He said also that he always gave expression to his immost feelings in his speeches, and therefore I could, by listening to them, best come to get at his modes of thought, and understand his I should also try to report his speeches, he said, in order that I might develop my powers of rapid composition

On Monday therefore I availed myself of the respite

NOWGONG

We got on board the steamer again at the Tezpur landing place at about 10 A.M on the 22nd August. After a short journey by steamer we were to take train for Nowgong and reach there on the morning of the 23rd Two or three spies had got on board in spite of the fact that it was a special steamer chartered for Mahatman. Mr Mahomed Alı coming to learn of it, began to rage and threaten, and the poor fellows, hid themselves in fear in a dark corner. When the volunteers came and asked Mr Phooken what was to be done with them he a genial open hearted gentlemen laughed beartily at their plight and let them remain where they were Mahatmai s bed had been spread out on the upper deck. I went there for a while to arrange the things properly and then getting down to the lower deck laid myself down on a bench Shortly after Prabhudas came and sat there and told me that Mahatmali had been speaking about me Although I was there at the time I had not understood the talk, as it was in Guzarati. Prabhudas did not tell me what Mahatmaji had said but just told me that be had been specially enjoined by Mahatmali to look after my diet.

Tired as I was after the day s toil the cool breeze of the Brahmaputra soon julled me to sleep and I did not know when the steamer had left or when it had stopped again. When Mr Hirowe Secretary to Seth Jannala; Bajaj woke me np and took me to the river bank, I found that we had come to some unknown village far away from Tezpur It was then 3 O'Clock in the moining and the solemn stillness of the night pervaded the atmosphere There was no sign of human habitation near by, yet Mahatmaji's reception suffered not a bit. A long line of plantain trees had been planted the whole way up from the river, and the whole route was beautifully illuminated with the help of three or four lights hung up on each tree We heard that a large crowd had gathered at the place in the evening. We saw in the moonlight a roll of white cloth spread out into the lar distance I was told by Hirowe that it was the crowd of people who had come from distant villages to receive Mahatmaji. It is they who had gone to All praise to sleep on the river bank in that weird fashion their enthusiasm, to their patience. If we had arrived early in the night, Mahatman would have been received here, and everywhere else, with the shouts and rejoicings of the multitude, but the solemn grandeur of this reception in the illumined silence of the night was unforgettably There was a short walk to the station from our landing-place, and some four or five of us proceeded in advance by an unfrequented path to the station with the idea of going to sleep in the train. My friend, Mr Hirowe, was a Mahratta of Ullain, far from being awed by the dead silence of that night in far-off Assam, he seemed rather to enjoy it with keen zest

Reaching Nowgong in the morning, we were confronted by a true picture of what the Assamese Government was like. We had not witnessed this sort of thing before. The Deputy Commissioner of the place had dreamt dreams of riots and breaches of the peace on the advent of Mahatmaji, the very apostle of peace and had made elaborate arrange ments to cope with the coming disturbances A large body of police men had been posted at the Station and barricades had been put up on the roads to prevent the coming of the crowds. At the station no carriage being available in that small town an Indian tonga" was waiting to take Mahatman and Maulana Mohamed Ah in procession through the town. The rest of us did not accompany the procession but walked directly to our appointed residence a distance of a mile and a half Last night none of us had slept for more than two bours and we were all more or less fatigued. After bath and meal Mahatman attended a meeting of Marwari merchants held at his own place. Then he went off to the ladles meeting after which be was to attend a public meeting. At the place originally fixed up for the public meeting the dais had been put up but the Police had occupied the place the previous night under orders of the Denuty Commissioner on the plea that it was a public place. So a new site had to be chosen and cleaned for the purpose in the course of the same night and another dals had to be put up and other arrangements made the enthusiasm of the volunteers was equal to the task. They had done everything with their own hands from the sweeping of the ground to the erection of the dais in the course of the very same night

Maulana Mahomed Ali was the first to speak at the meeting. After describing in his own powerful style the various ills that afflicted India he pointed ont that the attainment of Swaraj or Freedom was the only remedy and further that there could be no Swaraj without Hindu Muslim

A small two-whreled vehicle drawn by a horse

His was a long speech, but it made a great impres-Mahatman followed Maulana Saheb He said that he would say in a few words what he had to say, and then set fire to the pile of foreign cloth that the people of Nowgong had collected for a bonfire. He said that he had been officiating at this Yagna or holy sacrifice at every town that he had visited 'It was his firm belief that by such "Sacrifice" alone could India's dormant power be roused pointed out that India's present degradation was due to the people's lack of moral power, and that the development of that power alone would lead to the attainment of Swaraj, and along with it, the redressing of the Punjab and the Khilafat wrongs He said that in that day's Englishman had appeared an open letter addressed to him by Dr Pollen. It was the Doctor's contention that when he (Mahatman) had called the Government 'satanic', he had forgotten that Satan's empire could extend only over those who were themselves satanic in spirit Therefore, in calling the Government 'Satanic', Mahatmaji had been really condemning his own Mahatmaji admitted the truth of this charge, countrymen and said that it was precisely for that reason that he laid so much stress on the need for self-purification Muslim unity, Swadeshi, and the practice of Ahimsa were but so many steps on the 104d to such purification. He added that there was nothing like sacrifice to purify the heart and Taking the Swadeshi vow, and sacrificing all foreign cloth, would necessarily lead to self-purification They should all, therefore, give away their foreign cloth and take to spinning and weaving, thus learning to trust to themselves for their needs If a programme of the boycott of foreign cloth could be completed by the 30th of September of that year then the attainment of Swaraj in October was by oo means improbable. But if this work remained unful filled, he would frankly tell them that India was yet unfit for Swaraj

On our way back from the meeting we found a police force stationed along the road with their long lathis and preventing the passage of any but a few at a time. When the Deputy Commissioner saw that be could not prevent the meeting he had issued orders against two local leaders making them responsible for any breach of peace and prohibiting a procession. The leaders, seeing through the official game instructed the people to disband themselves and quietly go home. Retornlog from the meeting we proceeded straight to the station. Owing to the orders of the Deputy Commissioner there were out many people them at the station. We were thus able to leave. Nowgong to peace and some of the more witty spirits amongst us gove their hearty thanks to the Deputy Commissioner for the service he had done us by issuing the order.

We passed the whole night in the train. On the morning of the 24th August, we stopped at Titabar Station, where we changed train, and in the course of the same day arrived at Jorhat We had hitherto been travelling due east through an altogether unfamiliar country, and it seemed as though our journey would have no ending was a surprise to find how Mahatmaji's name had penetrated into those remote corners of Assam Even in the depth of night, we could hear cries of "Mahatma Gandhi ki Jay" (Victory to Mahatma Gandhi) at every station where the train had to stop It had become so familiar a thing to hear these cries from the lips of large multitudes that ordinarily it would not attract our attention. But hearing it in these distant solitudes of Assam, our curiousity was roused, and we could not help looking out of our train. At many a small station we saw people assembled from distant villages, and waiting with lighted torches for Mahatmaji's Dharshan ' Those who have been brought up in the lap of luxury in towns and cities, and whose eyes have become habituated to gas and electric lights, might view with amusement or contempt the torch-lights, the half-naked bodies, the rustic talk and the manners of these poor illiterate countrymen of ours, but more than anything else such a reception as this was eloquent of the power of the movement, and the extent to which Mahatmaji's influence had permeated the masses

^{*} A view of Mahatmaji as an auspicious thing

It was 8 or 9 in the morning when we reached Jorhat. After holding two or three meetings that day we had again to pack up and leave in the evening. Owing to heavy rains overnight, there were pools of water on the site chosen for the public meeting but the meeting was held there never theless. While the meeting was on, the sun suddenly shone with such fierce blaze that a couple of persons fainted on the spot. In the middle of the meeting a couple of robust Gurkha senovs came elbowing their way through the crowd and stood just in front of the platform facing Mahatman and Maulana Mahomed Ali. They were grim fierce-looking forms while they began surveying everything from end to end. Maulana Mahomed Als who was speaking at the time had a word or two in reference to them also in his speech But when he sat down the whole assembly rang with joyous cries of Victory to Mahatma Gandhi the scene moved even the hearts of the Gurkhas. They could no longer preserve their haughty looks their frightful mien suffered a sudden change and they joined the crowd in their loud cries of Victory to Mahatma Gandhi I followed them for some distance after the meeting had broken up. I found them walking as if io a delirium of lovous excitement. It was there that I could realise how injectious was the collective enthusiasm of a crowd and how rapid its working. The language the feelings and associations of the Gurkhas were so different from those of the crowd and yet their hanghty courage had to bon before the power of this collective moral force

Io the evening we took the light Railway from Jorhat After going as far as Mariani by this line we were to take next morning the bigger train of the Assam Bengal Railway for Dibrugarh The Jorhat line was the narrowest gauge line that I had seen in India The carriages looked like so many toys Sometimes one could even run faster than the The carriages were in such bad repair that, when the train began to move, we were afraid that the whole might come down with a crash The doors once opened would not close again 'At night there was no light in the train. Such was this railway line, and we were to travel by a special train on that line But that night's experiences of the special train could never be forgotten. I had not had any rest throughout the day and so I went to sleep, as soon as I got into the train. We had been told that the train was to leave at ten o'clock, but we found no proper arrangement at the station itself Apparently there was no fixed time table on this line, no bother about "Line clear" and other things of the kind, they could start at any time that they liked my sleep, I knew not when the train had started. but suddenly, when the night was far advanced, we were roused from sleep by a sudden shock up, we began to raise a hue and cry. The train had then stopped. Some of us, going out to enquire about the matter, learnt that our train had collided with a couple of carriages that had got detached from behind the train that had preceded us, and had been blocking the line None of us had sustained any injuries but we were at a loss to make out how our train was to proceed, the road being blocked With no other alternative before it, our train began slowly to labour on, pushing the blocking carriages before it Our little engine could hardly muster enough energy for this work, the poor thing had to stop at every step to take breath, in the midst of this pushing and furning. When we had proceeded for about a mile in this fashion the guard came running with a Deitz lantern in hand and fell to abusing the driver. We then came to learn from him that, in the midst of our train's desperate effort, Mahatman s carriage had dropped ont from the rear and been left far behind us. We all came out to see hou things stood and discovered that Mahatmaji's carriage had in fact been left behind. We were beude ourselves with fear. We were taking along with us one who was the life and soul of India and each one of us, we felt was responsible for his safety and welfare more or less. But here we had cast him away in the dead of night in a wilderness with nobody by his side. We then called upon the driver to back the train and as the train moved back we all stood on the foot board and kept looking out with eager outstretched gaze. When after traversing a long distance we sighted Mahatman s carriage in the moon light, all of us ran up and stood about his carriage Seeing us all he burst out laughing nor could we trace the least anxiety or fear in his countenance. He laughingly told us that he had not thought that we should return, but was rather expecting that a train from behind would come and overturn his carriage Even a serious mishap like this did not make him anxious nor did he show any signs of displeasure at his being deprived of his nightly rest nor did we hear from his lips one word of disparagement of the Railway authorities at this incredible mismanagement on their part.

DIBRUGARH

Owing to the mishaps of the night, we were very late in reaching the Mariani Station, where when we came up, the train of the Assam-Bengal Railway was waiting ready to start It had been specially detained for As soon as we arrived, we made haste to get into it The people at the station helped in carrying our luggage and putting it into the train as quickly as possible. Assam, Mahatmaji, was everywhere treated with Royal honours The volunteers had hoisted two large tri-colour national flags and they were floating on either side of Mahatmaji's compartment As Mahatmaji disliked travelling in pomp and grandeur, he begged that the flags might be removed, but they were not taken away Dibrugarh is a great centre of the tea-industry It is therefore a place where many Englishmen would be continually coming and going on business In our train, too, there were some English passengers, who did not like Mahatmaji's making a triumphal progress with flying colours. Now, as the train was moving very fast, the big bamboo pole to which the left-hand flag was attached, struck violently against a post, and broke in two, and the flag getting detached was seen flying away At this, three or four Europeans looking out of the train, fell to clapping and shouting for joy train itself, at the doors at short intervals were able Assamese volunteers wearing distinctive turbans keeping guard One of these seeing the flag fly off caoght hold of it at great personal risk and held it out with outstretched hands with his face towards those Europeans. At this exhibition of uncommon courage and celerity they hung down their heads in shame and disappeared from view out of the train. To-day when I think of this little incident, my heart goes not in admiration to the Assamese. For methinks when our Eoglish officials, who having flung Mahatmaji into prison should boast of having broken up the flag-staff of the Non-co-operation movement they shall see how in every province of India, the flag would be caught up once again and firmly held in the hand and then, they too shall have to hang down their heads in shame like these English planters of Assam

The train having stopped at a particular station on the way Prabhudas took me to Mahatmaji s compartment and gave me some fruits to eat. Then I saw Mahatmaji reading and correcting my report of his Sasaram speech been reading it carefully word by word and handing it to me asked me to note the corrections he had made. After I had read it, he sent it for publication in Young India As I found Mahatmaji looking grave at all times I rarely went to him unless sent for I suppose he assumed this seriousness in order to get through his work. Once or twice I had even seen him cooling his forehead and head with ice. And yet everyday whether in his room or in the train he would go on calmly and patiently writing articles for the Navapoan and Young India while all around him people were making noise and the crowds were howling outside Such complete mastery over the mind seemed to me unique When he had done with the report of the Sasaram speech

he took up that of his Gauhati speech, but put it by, having looked through it a little

At 12 noon on the 25th August, we reached Dibrugarh, almost the easternmost extremity of Assam, from where our return journey was to begin. We were to stay there the whole day and till 2 PM the next day, when we were to take the train for Silchar. From Silchar we were to proceed to Sylhet, thence to Chittagong and from Chittagong to Barisal via Chandpur, and from Barisal after a day's stay, we were to come back to Calcutta on the 4th September. Invitations had poured in from Comilla, Khulna, and other places, but Mahatmaji had declined them all. He was bound to reach Calcutta before the 6th September, as on that day a meeting of the Working Committee had been arranged.

Reaching Dibrugarh, I took my bath and meal and was resting for a while when I was sent for by Mahatmaji. He gave me some telegrams to despatch, and then asked me to compile for his use, from Gazetteers and other Government publications, all material facts and figures about tea-plantations and the conditions of labour in Assam. Just then, came Mr. Nabin Bardalai, who had all the facts concerning Assam at his finger's end, and who promptly answered every question put to him by Mahatmaji. The astonishing mastery of facts and figures relating to Assam shown by Mr. Bardalai was a revelation to me

At Dibrugarh Mahatmaji took special trouble to gather information on the conditions of labour in the tea-gardens. As that night's meeting was to be his last in Assam, he wished to address some words of comfort to the poor oppressed labourers. It was in his name that the labourers had come out of the tea gardens at the time of the Chandpur trouble but it was not possible then for him to come and stand by their side. Now that Mahatmaji was in Assam the planters were in mortal dread that his visit should revive the excitement of those days. The planters had therefore taken to threats and so cowed the labourers that they dared not come to meet Mahatmaji. Thus when at the night's public meeting desiring to know how many labourers had actually attended the meeting Mahatmaji called upou the labourers present to raise their hands, it was found that not more than three or four had the courage to do so notwithstanding that the audience numbered some ten to fifteen thousand. Secretly however a cooly had already come and seen Mahatmaji at his residence and given him a full account of their woes.

At the public meeting Mahatmaji gave expression to some of his deepest thoughts and convictions. He explained what sort of Swarai it was that he craved for India and how a whole-hearted pursuit of Swadeshi even as a religious discipline was essential for the attainment of such Swaraj The mere transference of political power mto the hands of Indians from those of Englishmen would indeed be a sort of Swarai But he argued that the test of its genuineness lay in the answer to the question whether it had brought peace to the hearts of the poor whether it had enabled them to live happy contented lives. If these questions could not be answered in the affirmative then India had nothing at all to gain from such Swara; There were in Assam almost a million labourers who had come from different provinces of India to earn a bare subsistance and Mahatman declared how unnatural from a social point of view, it was that so many poor Indians should be driven to leave their homes, their families, their friends and their communities, merely to get the wherewithal to live state of things could not be changed under the new regime then the attainment of Swarai would be a snare and a That was why he had been laying so much stress on spinning and 'weaving, and the wearing of Khaddar." And Mahatmaji went on explaining at length that the country's welfare could not be completely secured and the woes of the poor removed, unless each and every home had learnt to depend on itself for its clothing, much in the same way as each home has learnt to prepare its own food, instead of being dependent for it on hotels It was, therefore, a religious duty for them to take the vow of Swadeshi, and it was because the use of foreign cloth was a deadly obstacle to the fulfilment of that duty that he was never so happy as when destroying it wherever it was found. Not being able to understand aright his feeling about the matter, many he said, had been finding fault with him on the ground that it was a feeling born of hatred of the foreigner

But his answer was that if they would but calmly bethink themselves of the volume of suffering that foreign cloth had brought in its train, of the many millions that had died of famine, as well of those who had been dragging on a miserable existence on empty or half filled stomachs, then they could not help agreeing with him in regarding such foreign cloth as truly impure and untouchable. He burnt foreign cloth not out of a spirit of hatred of foreigners, but in the spirit in which they would burn the clothes of a plague-stricken man. That was why he felt never so happy

as when destroying foreign cloth worn by Indians. The sin of wearing foreign cloth was, in his mind worse than the sin of using intoxicating drugs, all the more so because it was an unconscious sin. Hence it was that, in speaking of self purification he gave as important a place to the boycott of foreign cloth as to the avoldance of intoxicants and the control of the evil passions of anger violence hatred and the like

In every town of Assam he had visited Mahatmaji had made a bonfire of foreign cloth but at Dibrugarh alone no arrangement had been made for the same. The enthusiasm of the people however was by no means less here than elsewhere but the work suffered for want of a devoted and selfless leader Mahatmaji was very sorry that he had not been able to make this holy sacrifice on that the last day of his stay in Assam Seth Jamnalalii instead of accompany mg us to Jorhat, had gone straight to Dibrugarh from Nowgong The foreign cloth trade of Assam was all in the hands of the Marwans, and Dibrumarh was a chief centre of that trade. Jamualalu therefore wanted to stay with the Marwaris of his place for a few days, and induce them to take the Swadeshi vow Everywhere at his instance special meetings of Marwaris were held at which they gave their signatures to a written promise to boycott foreign At some places they offered to give an undertaking not to import foreign cloth but only for one year. To this Mahatman did not agree for from his point of view in this matter of Swadeshi no yielding or compromise was permussible

view, it was that so many poor Indians should be driven to leave their homes, their families, their friends and their communities, merely to get the wherewithal to live
If this state of things could not be changed under the new regime then the attainment of Swaraj would be a snare and a delusion That was why he had been laying so much stress on spinning and weaving, and the wearing of Khaddar And Mahatmaji went on explaining at length that the country's welfare could not be completely secured and the woes of the poor removed, unless each and every home had learnt to depend on itself for its clothing, much in the same way as each home has learnt to prepare its own lood, instead of being dependent for it on hotels. Not being able to understand aright his feeling about the matter, many he said, had been finding fault with him on the ground that it was a feeling born of hatred of the foreigner

as when destroying foreign cloth worn by Indians. The sin of wearing foreign cloth was, in his mind worse than the sin of using intoxication drugs all the more so because it was an unconscious sin. Hence it was that, in speaking of self purification he gave as important a place to the boycott of foreign cloth as to the avoldance of intoxicants and the control of the evil passions of anger violence hatred and the like.

In every town of Assam he had visited Mahatmaji had made a boofire of foreign cloth but at Dibrugarh alone no arrangement had been made for the same. The enthusiasm of the people however was by no means less here than elsewhere, but the work suffered for want of a devoted and selfless leader. Mahatmaji was very sorry that he had not been able to make this holy sacrifice on that the last day of his stay to Assam Seth Jamualalu instead of accompany mg us to Jorhat, had gone straight to Dibrugarlı from Nowgong The foreign cloth trade of Assam was all in the hands of the Marwaris and Dibrugarh was o chief centre of that trade. Jamnalalji therefore wanted to stay with the Marwaris of his place for a few days and induce them to take the Swadeshi von Everywhere at his instance special meetings of Marwaris were held at which they gave their signatures to a written promise, to boycott foreign cloth. At some places they offered to give an undertaking not to import foreign cloth but only for one year To this Mahatmaji did oot agree for from his point of view to this matter of Swadeshi oo yielding or compromise was permissible

Mahatmaji coocluded his Assam programme with a friendly meeting and talk with the Planters Association at

Dibrugarli He was to leave Dibrugarli at 2 P M on the 26th August, and his visit to the Planters' Club had been put down for 10, O' Clock on that day None knew whom he would take with him, and as he had told me nothing about it, I was not in readiness to go Meanwhile, Mahatmaji had left so that he might be there punctually at the appointed time Jamnadas, however, insisted upon my going and I drove in a carriage On reaching the club, I found Mahatman seated in the midst of Planters In the middle of the room was a big table, on one side of which were the seats for visitois Among the leaders, I saw Moulana Mahomed Alı, Seth Jamnalalıı, and some of the chief men of Assam. We were also there -Prabhudas, Hirowe and myself I had been given to understand that the planters of Assam wielded immense power and that common people dared not approach them But who could keep back the surging crowd to-day now that Mahatmaji was there? Even the commonest coolies, who usually fled at the sight of Europeans had group after group by stealthy steps advanced to the precincts of the Club, and finding that none prevented them had even dared to enter in, with the result that it became very hard to keep order inside. As it was the wish of the planters that their conversation with Mahatmaje should remain private, no report was taken of any of the speeches made But the crowd made it impossible to hold a quiet private conversation There was so much noise around that it was a wonder that the planters could bear it all with such exemplary patience and quiet dignity When, however, in response to a request from the President of the Association, Mahatmaji began his talk, then for once all noise was hushed I had never heard him speak in English, as all his speeches hitherto had been in Hindi but when he made this speech I knew not whether to call it a speech or an inspired utterance pregnant with celestial force. His style was altogether plate and unaderned but every single word came from the innermost depths of his heart, and acted like a charm. Hence the more sounds of his words pierced and entered the hearts of his hearers. As he went oo talking in a solemn straio it seemed as though he was casting a hypnotic spell over the audieoce and irresistibly drawing all hearts to himself. I noticed that as he spoke there was no motion in his eyes nor was there the slightest movement of the limbs. It was clear to me that at the time his mind must also have attained a state of absolute calm. For how else could his words create such an atmosphere of peace in the heart of the hearers? I had never before heard such criticisms so truthful and yet so sweet and severe as came from Mahatmail's lips. He detailed to his hearers all the charges that Indians could bring against the European planters, giving also at the same time all his previous personal experiences on the matter be was discussing. I could hardly tell what power it was that had enabled him to win the planters so completely over that in spite of the severe condemnation he had passed on them not only did none dare to raise his voice lo reply but speaker after speaker from among them rose to thank him for his fearlessness outspokenness and to promise that they would in future try to follow the ideal that he had set before them.

On Mahatmaji coming out when the meeting was over the crowd rushed at him each man trying to elbow his way into his presence. Prabhudas Hirowe and myself on

-coming out, saw that the crowd round Mahatmaji was so great that it was hopeless for us to try to reach the car So advancing a little we stood on the road and waited, thinking that we might be given a lift when the car passed that way But as soon as the car started, the people began running after it, and we were lost in the crowd When the crowd broke up, as there was no carriage for us, we did not know how to get back None of us knew the way, and the time for the train was also approaching By asking a man we came to know that there was no chance of our catching the train if we started walking the distance, to our quarters So, instead of returning to our place, we made straight for the station, where soon after Mahatmaji with the other members of the party airived There was a large gathering on the platform and outside, and everyone was trying to force his way into Mahatmaji's presence Fearing that this might lead to a rush, and that the crowd might get out of control, Mahatmaji got up on a stool or chair Now he was visible to everybody, even to those that had stood at a distance and no-body stirred from his place, and there was no more -trouble

ON THE WAY TO SILCHAR.

From Dibrugarh to Silchar is a journey of 32 hours at a stretch with three changes of trains on the way. In order to avoid the trouble of changing trains a single bogie carriage had been engaged for us with First, Second Interand Third Class compartments in it so that the carriage might be detached from one train and attached to the pext. The unsurpassed delight and the uncommon trooble of this 32 hours 100 mey neither could ever be obliterated from memory For the last 15 or 16 days we had been incessant ly moving from place to place and travelling in the train night and day and it seemed as if all the vital elements of our physical body had perished ing close on this the strain on our bodies entailed by a coothenal journey of 32 hours with the velocity of the wind could be appreciated only by those who have travelled long distances by rail. But on the other hand to shake off the effects of this exhaustion. Nature for a space of 10 or 11 hoors from the Landing Junction has spread out her stores of weard celestral beauty along the Naga mountain range creating a ventable dreamland which whose hath seen hath fulfilled his eyes and mind a desire

In the course of these 32 hours I had not been to-Mahatmaji's compartment more than once and that too was only for an hour between the Dibrugarh and Tinsukia stations, perhaps immediately after leaving Dibrugarh. Then I heard him ask with a faint smile on his countenance how far was that town of Assam whose people taking to heart that he had not visited it, had by a letter threatened to lie across the railroad, but as I had not heard of this, I could not understand what the matter was. When we reached Tınsukıa, Prabhudas, Hırowe, and myself fixed up our beds at a convenient place and early in the evening we were lulled to sleep by the swaying train. Sometime after, when the night had advanced we were suddenly aroused by the loud roar and excitement and shout of a large concourse of people Getting up, we noticed that it was 11 O' Clock, and that we had reached the Sivasagar Road Station, the very place, I believe, from where the people had sent that threatening letter to Mahatmaji In the meantime Mahatmaji had gone to sleep at 9, his usual hour, and Jamnadas was keeping guard in his compartment As soon as the train stopped at Sivasagar Road, the people tried to force their way into Mahatmaji's compartment with lights and with cries of Jai (victory) to rouse him from sleep, not caring to understand how essen--tial it was that he should have perfect rest at night, if his whole days' programme of work had to be gone through Besides, in those critical times, even a single day's illness would have unsettled so many things, and we were particularly watchful that his night's rest was not disturbed When the people of Sivasagar tried to wake up Mahatmaji with their lights and their unearthly cries, Jamnadas tried his best to dissuade them, and when one or two of them not minding him tried to force themselves into the compartment Jamnadas blocked the passage and prevented their entrance By this time Moulana Mohamad Alı had woke up, and hearing the terrible noise and cries in front of Mahatmaji is compartment came down and drove away the disturbers at which they were beside themselves with fory. We were all surprised to see that, inspite of all this uproar. Mahatmaji was still lying fast asleep. But the lood cries of shame at the Moulana Saheb, and clapping of hands caused such a tumolt as to wake him op and he hurriedly got up and with eyes half sleep; went and stood at the entrance asking what the matter was. As soon as the bolsterous crowd, saw Mahatmaji they iostantly forgot their anger and all sat down kneeling oo the platform with cries of rejoicing. The driver now saw his opportuoity and without sounding the whistle quietly moved the train out of the platform and with one long pull reaching beyond the range of the seething mass, we found ourselves racing breathlessly along through the dense darkness.

The next day (27th August) the morning having u little advanced the train when nearing Lamding Junction came to a sudden stop. The station could be seen at a distance. An English Rallway official came hurriedly up with a number of servants and intimated to Moolana Mohamed Ali that as our train was late the coooceting train from Landing had already left. As there was on other train available that day he proposed to attach our bogie to a Goods train which was just then leaving for Boderpore and Silchar Finding that otherwise we should be left stranded at Landing for the whole of the day Moulana Saheb readily agreed to this, and thanked the official for his civility. Then the Saheb himself with all promptitode began shuoting with the help of his men and oor bogie was attached to the Goods traio According to the Congress classification of provinces Mahatmail's Assum tour concluded with Lamding Beyond Lamding there is an impassable mountain range which forms the natural boundary between Assam and Bengal After traversing this mountain range we shall be able to reach the towns of Silchar and Sylhet in the Surma Valley As the Surma Valley is inhabited by Bengali-speaking people it has been included in the Bengal province by the Congress, though politically it is under the Government of Assam At Lamding therefore, we had to bid farewell to our Assamese friends, and Mi Phookan left for Gauhati, followed by the indefatigable ever cheerful, Goswami brothers and other Assamese volunteers

By this time, the crowd that had been waiting on the Lamding station platform to have a sight of Mahatmaji, finding that our carriage had been attached to the Goods train, moved up to us As a result of the Assam Bengal Railway strike following on the labour troubles of Chandpur many Railway servants had been left idle at Lamding They wanted that Mahatmaji should stay there for the day, and listen to the story of their sufferings Finding that I was the only Bengali in the company of Mahatmaji, many came to me, and gave expression to all sorts of fears Some said that we had to traverse difficult paths across the mountain range, and no train could be run there at night, so that if, we could not cross this awful region of mountains and dense forests sometime before it was evening, then indeed therewas terrible cause for alarm Some even went to the length of affirming that the Railway official who had attached Mahatmaji's carriage to the Goods train, must have had a motive in doing so For if that train was let slip from a mountaintop, all worries and fears of the British Government on Mahatmaji s account would vanish in a trice, while at the same time no particular responsibility would rest on its shoulders because of the specious plea that the whole of the goods train had come down and been lost

I was of course not prepared to make a laughing stock of myself by carrying these tales of imaginary fear be fore Mahatmail Soon the train started and we hegan to enter into that impenetrable forest. Even in the depths of these dense woods and mountain ranges there were stations at distances of 10 to 20 miles and though there were no sions of any human habitation all round small crowds had collected at every station drawn by the name of Mahatmail eager to have a sight of him and to greet him with sounds of Jai (Victory to Maliatma Gandhi) I was struck with wonder to think how his name could possibly have none trated into these trackless woods. Arriving at one station we found that the special train of the Governor of Assam proceeding in the opposite direction towards Lamding had arrived. When the two trains were drawn up side by side, itseemed to me as though we were witnessing the strength of the British Government and of Mahatmaji being weighed and measured in the balance against each other. The Governor s train furnished and glittering shone like a mirror and armed soldiers were keeping guard but in spite of all this pride of wealth and display of power not one man of the whole throng cast a glance in that direction but all eagerly rushed up to the unsightly goods train in which Mahatmaji was travelling and stood crowding about it The bustle apparently disturbed the Governor's repose and Mahatmaji s train was removed to some distance but this only made the contrast between the strength weilded by

Mahatmaji and by the Governor all the more glaring. The Governer's train deserted by all lay still at some distance like a lifeless thing, while whatever manifestation of life and movement there was, in that forest-clad, mountain-girdled region, was all centicd round Mahatmaji's compartment

The wild, maccessible nature of this region can be judged by the readers from the very names of the stations that we had to pass through after Lamding First, Hatikhali, then Lanting, Mupa, Maibang, Haflang Jatinda, Mailandisa. and so forth. When, after passing through many stations with names derived from some unknown tongue, ending with Damchara and Kachlichara, we reached a station called Chandranathpui, then from that familiar sound itself we could see that we had emerged from the forest into the This Hill-Section of the Assam Bengal world of men Railway is, indeed, a marvellous achievement of Englishmen One cannot help admiring their perseverance and determination, when one realises the extraordinary labour and energy that must have been required to construct a railway line across that inaccessible country I have heard that formerly herds of wild elephants used to infest the line and obstruct passage, challenging men's right to oust them from the sovereignty of their own domains and though latterly such accidents had become raie, trains were not confidently run on this section during the night region, O! how full of terrors and yet how beautiful At one place peak after peak rises, one above another, as if aspiring to reach high heavens, on a hill the passing rainbearing cloud comes and discharges itself in diszling drops, on another, the sun's rays falling, sparkle and glitter, on still another, cloud and ray melting into each other encircle

the hill with a raiobow of superb beauty. Here the sunbeams struggling through a dense envelope of mist suffuse the whole atmosphere with a ruddy glow Still again at another place some proud mountain top defiantly rears its head against the sky hiding the sun from view and casting the dense rows of trees below in a deep shade. Seeing this beantiful alternation of light and shade of cloud and mist, of sunlight and rain and the blending here and there of nature s green loveliness with the ruddy glow of the atmosphere it seemed to me as if in this forest-clad region day and night, morning and evening held simultaneous away and the six seasons of the year were displaying in profusion, all at the same time the wooders of their beauties. Here and there are seen broad valleys among the monotains with little torrents leaping from rock to rock in sprightly mood and dashing along Sometimes a valley rising higher and higher by slow degrees seems to hold a distant peak on its lap and so with peak after peak as wave following wave as far as the eye could reach. At times when the train was climbing a mountain height with slow difficult steps it seemed as if like us, the train also under the intoxication of the surprising beauty of the place was finding its power of movement gone. Observing the train a slow pace in many a place had I in tancy been allured to step down from it and entranced by that bewitching beauty seen visions of a life lived m a cuttage under the shadow of those mountains and under the blue vault of the sky Prabhudas who had been for sometime with Mahatmaji now came and told me that Mahatmaji having seen with own eyes the extraordinary beauty of the place marvelled greatly that such a paradise on earth lay hidden in the jungles of Assam unsuspected by the world outside, and declared that although he had travelled far and wide in Europe, Africa and India, his eyes had not beheld another scene of such exceeding loveliness

It was night when we emerged from the mountainous country and reached the Buderpore Junction Large bodies of men from Silchar carrying loads of articles of all sorts have arrived at Buderpore to receive Mahatmaji The unalloyed peace and calm which we had been enjoying to our heart's fill among the mountains all the day long departed, and in the crush and the noise, Nature presented herself in a wholly different form. Some may say that this is the living and dynamic aspect of nature while the other is static and devoid of animation. But I have been face to face with, and have felt and understood the life that throbs in, and the consciousness that pervades, the wooded hills, and the brooks and the air and the sky and the clouds, in forest-clad Assam And now having beheld silent Nature's lovely form, and having heard in my inmost heart, her speechless, marticulate messages, all activity of the outer world now seemed harsh and repulsive Here successive crowds of men like swarms of locusts had filled the place and encircled Mahatmaji and the sounds of their voice as they were exchanging words seemed to me at the time so insipid and rugged. The dense darkness of the night then reigned all round, but outside the station, at a selected spot. had gathered a vast crowd with lights in hand to receive Viewing this lengthy procession of lights and the huge concourse of men, it seemed to me as if, on the eve of hostilities, a vast line of troops were standing in battle-When Mahatmaji was being escorted to the place from the station observing the dense darkness of the night we were greatly perturbed to think of the terrible con sequences if somehow order among the crowd gave way But we felt somewhat reassured when Mohammed Ali Saheb walking behind but with outstretched hands on either side of Mahatmaji protected him from the encircling crowd Back again in the midst of men it appeared as if under a spell of self forgetfulness we had been insensible of the strain of this prolonged unbroken journey of 32 hours. Now dull slumber so relaxed and overpowered our whole frame that almost ma half-sleepy state we reached Silchar at ten in the night, amidst the shouts of victory and the acclarations of the people.

CHAPTER 'XIII SILCHAR

At Silchar we set foot on the soil of Bengal, though even from Buderpore we had begun to breathe the Bengali The Bengali heart and the Bengali language atmosphere are just as soft as Bengal's soil, and consequently the heartfelt feelings of the Bengali find spontaneous expression in sweet verse and music. The great Swadeshi agitation of Bengal had its beginning in a song, and had its growth in song And when the song ceased to be sung, the energy that had inspired the movement also ceased to work. Then in those days of Swadeshi in every village of Bengal new poets had come into being and all the highways and 'byeways of the province resounded with unceasing song In fact when I think of the Swadeshi upheaval of sixteen years ago, and contemplate what among the great things we had done was indeed the greatest, I cannot find anything greater than the revelry of song to which we had then abandoned ourselves The people of Silchar who had come to Buderpore to welcome Mahatmaji and escort him to Silchar began singing in chorus in the train, reminding me of the old Swadeshi agitation days They were, of course, expressing their joy in having Mahatmaji as their guest, in the way most natural to Bengalis But the other members of Mahatmaji's party not being Bengalis, and having undergone fatiguing journey were not in a mood to take kindly to so many people singing in chorus in a loud voice, and

Mahomed Ali Saheb called out to have it stopped even while the train was in motion

At Silchar we put up at the house of Mr Kamini Kumar Chanda. Mr Chanda having been unwell had gone down to Calrutta but returned the day after Mahatmaji's arrival. In his absence Mr Chanda's son Mr Arun Kumar acted as our host. In Mahatmaji's party, were Jaminadas Prabhudas and myself (Krishnadas). This similarity of names misled Arun Kumar, who thought that Krishnadas (myself) must be like the others in Guzarati, and he began his conversation with me in English.

Seeing him talk in English I thought I might as well follow his example and keep my matter a secret. This however could not be for long as Jammadas told him private that I was a Bengali. When he had heard about this, Mr. Arun Kumar came to me laughing—and protesting that I had imposed upon him with my name began to cultivate my friendship afresh. Arun Kumar stole the hearts of all of us by his goodness—his simplicity—and his expert service and Mahatmaji lumself began to cherish an affection for him.

We were so fatigued with the day's journey that we lay down to sleep for the right wherever we could find room but the fatigue continued even on the day following. Ever since joining Mahatmaji. I had not been able to find a spot where I could quietly sit and take rest even for two minutes together. Only those who have had such experience can imagine how disquieting it is to have to spend all one with hundreds of people all about them. I found in the morning that Mahatmaji was also looking much tred and that he was trying to forget his fatigue by laughing and playing with the many little boys and girls who had come to see him. I was watching, and I saw how by a single affectionate look, he was able to draw the heart of a child to himself, and seeing the way in "which he mixed with these children, one felt that his heart was more with them than with grown-up persons. He took a child on his lap, and feeling his soft touch, it instantly fell into a sound sleep; then he lifted it from his lap with a laugh and put it into somebody else's lap. All this time there were people crowding in his room, but they soon left, and then he sent for me from the next room, and began to dictate a letter to an English friend. After proceeding a little he stopped, but told me that I should get the work done some other time. He then lay down and closed his eyes to take rest for a while

According to our programme we were to leave Silchar at four in the afternoon Mahatmaji returned in time having attended a public meeting and visited the National School As I was busy packing things and preparing to leave for the Station, I could not attend the meeting From Silchar to Sylhet was only about a hundred miles but it was a most tedious journey We should have to change trains at two stations, and at a Station called Kulaura, which was to be reached at midnight, we should have to wait till morning for the next train In order to save Mahatmaji all this trouble, the Sylhet people after taking considerable pains had succeeded at the very last moment to engage for us a special train. So our departure at 4 O'clock was postponed

The special train was to leave at 9 or 10, in the night. It being Sunday night, Mahatmaji took to silence before that hour Since reaching Silchar I was much troubled in spirit. I began to ask myself why I shoold be going about with Mahatmail I knew not what sort of work he hoped to get dooe by me as he had not given me any special work all these days. From what I had seen of him it did not strike me that he stood much in need of other people s help as he personally attended to most of his work and was apparently unwilling to depend open anybody to get his work done. The only work he had given me was the preparation of English reports of his Hindi speeches and even that I had not been able to do to my satisfaction. It was simply impossible for me to do any writing work in the hurry and hustle of our constant shifting and in the midst of the incessint noise and bustle of crowds. It was out of the question also to think of settling down to any writing work -while travelling in an over crowded Third Class compart ment. For all these reasons I had begun seriously to feel that, by going about from place to place to that fashion with no particular work to do I was simply putting Mahatmaji to unnecessary expense on my account. Thus in the course of a cooversation with Prabhodas that evening I onbordened to him the thought that was preying oo my mind Soon it was time for the special train to start, and I left for the station beforehand with the luggage Prabhudas was left behind to accompany Mahatmall in his car On the way to the station he had spoken to Mahatmaji about what was troubling me bot Mahatmaji had made no answer as he was under his you of sileoce All this I heard from Prabhudas as sooo as he joined me in the train Before however the train left, a great tumult arose within the station precincts but drowning the noise the stern voice of Maulana Mahomed Ali could be distinctly heard. The fact was that some spies had tried to travel in the Guard's van in this special train, and Mr. Mahomed Ali was holding out threats while ordering them to get away.

SVITET

We reached Sylhet on the morning of the 29th August. It being Mooday, Mahatmaji was under his vow of sileoce, and as he did not like to come in touch with outside people, he had written to me from the train itself to see that there was oo procession or the like. I informed those who had come to escort him of this. They explained to me that Mahatmaji's quarters had been fixed up in the vicinity of the Surma river and he could therefore go straight to it from the station by boat. After his departure Maulana Mahomed Ali Seth Jamnalahi and Maulana Azad Sobani could be taken in procession through the town to gratily the wishes of the general public. I conveyed this reply to Mahatmaji he nodded his assent satisfied that his silence would be duly respected

Sylhet is situated on the bank of the broad Surma nver and is reached from the station after crossing the river by boat. A large number of people had come in boats to welcome Mahatmaji so that there was a regular fleet of boats on the river. On the other bank of the river had also gathered a large cooccurse of people awaiting Mahatmaji s arrival. Feeling that the people of Sylhet might not be properly aquaioted with Mahatmaji s ways and habits and that they might not appreciate how very aoxious he would be to avoid meeting a crowd on the day of his silence and as a consequence they might be unable to make proper arrangements for him previous to his reaching his quarters,

I thought I must go in advance, and keep everything in readiness for him Accordingly I left in a small dingline (small country boat) with some volunteers. When I had gone half-way, I noticed that Mahatmaji instead of being taken straight to his quarters, was being taken to the parti--culai-ghat (landing place) whence the procession was to start It was long after we had reached our quarters, that he arrived On his head and body were seen loose fragments of flowers that had been thrown at him during the procession by people among the crowd, his face was flushed, and he was looking extremely grave Immediately on his arrival finding Seth Jamnalalji before him he at once took pencil and paper, and wrote in Gujarati to ask why he had been subjected to all that trouble that day Jamnalalji in his turn asked the local Congress Secretary, who was there This was the same gentleman to whom I had spoken on the -subject in the train, but he had not been able to keep his word, and Mahatmaji, too, being under his vow, had not been able to prevent what had happened The Secretary, being confronted with the question and noticing Mahatmaji's pained look, at once admitted his guilt, and expressed his readiness to suffer whatever penalty might be imposed upon But what penalty could Mahatmaji possibly impose? The people's eagerness to see him was quite natural, and they had flocked to Sylhet from all parts of the district in such large numbers that it demanded untiring effort on the part of the local workers to keep them under control these cucumstances it was indeed an extremely difficult task to get everything done in proper manner But the question was that if we failed even in this, was it possible for us to take upon our shoulders the responsibility of Swaraj?

We now began to feel keenly the want of an eshcient body of volunteers like what we had seen in Assam to look after Mahatmaji and protect him from the crowds. Hence I had myself to hurry about stationing volunteers at the proper places so that the crowd might not invade Mahat maji s room. On reaching Sylhet, Mahatmaji lost no time in keeping me engaged. He would give me written orders and in that way got a good deal of work ont of me. Thus I had been at work in his room from early morning until one O clock and then he gave me an article for Young India which he had written out in the train to copy.

It was usual with him to write m pencil in big characters, and he had a diary in which he noted the numbers of pages and the date of despatch of each article. That day he gave me work after work, allowing me no respite. It was clear to me that this was the result of Prabhudas s conversation with him about me on the previous evening though at the time he did not say anything because of his you of silence.

The volunteers soon acquired some experience and were able to keep ont the crowd so that Mahatmaji was able to spend the afternoon in comparative peace

The people were no longer allowed to come near him But there came in a largely signed Bengali petition in which the petitioners said that they had come from great distances in the expectation of seeing Mahatmaji and that owing to the great rush of people there was no room avail able in any hotel and even the stock of eatables in the bazaar had been well-nigh exhausted so that unless they could leave for their home by the evening steamer they would be forced to starve. They therefore prayed that if only Mahatmaji would come and stand on the verandah they were prepared to leave the place after having had a view of him from a distance. That day being his day of silence, and remembering the pain he had already felt that morning because of the people not having shown proper respect to that (to him) sacred day, I was hesitating whether I should take that petition to him or no. But after some thought I decided just to mention the matter to him, and in case he showed any unwillingness, to reject the petition. The moment, however, he heard of the suffering of the people, he went and stood on the verandah, saluting them with clasped hands, after which with repeated motion of the hand, he wished them to leave for their homes.

Moulana Mahomed Ali was here the guest of the local Khilafat Committee. He came once to see Mahatmaji when he showed him what had appeared in that day's paper concerning the Moplah outbreak of Malabar.

Mahatmaji's silence was broken in the evening, and he prepared to start for the public meeting. It was an open single horse carriage in which he was being conveyed to the meeting. In the meantime, so many people were anxious to come along with him that they had all got into it, and some were even standing on the footboard. The horse was strong and robust, but Mahatmaji felt that it was too much of a load for it to carry. He made vehement protests and offered to get down himself. When the human load was somewhat lightened, he consented to proceed in the carriage.

The meeting was held in the celebrated mosque of Sylhet There is not another like this in Bengal and Assam and the report is that there are not more than three or four like it in all India. Inside the mosque there is accommoda tion for some five or six thousand Mussalmans to sit at prayers all at one time. A dais on the western side of its raised courtyard was occupied by Maliatmaji the Moulanas Mahomed Ali and Azad Sobani and Seth Jamnalalu while before them on the sloping ground sat a vast patient multitude row noon row Behind in the space near the wall were a considerable section of the audience creating disturbance in their effort to push their way towards the leaders and Moulana Mahomed Alı was trying to pacify them with repeated shouts of silence When some order had been established. Mahatman began his speech in Hiodi He began by saying that the Khilafat movement was a religious movement. As soon as he understood that the Khilafat was one of the pullars of Islam he had joined the Millafat movement, in order to help in protecting the religion of his Mussalman brother He had debated within himself deply and come to the conclusion that if he had treated the matter lightly he should have been answerable to God for his failure to exert himself to preserve the inte onty of the religion of his brothers. He also saw that Hindu Muslim unity could be established in India on the basis of the Khilafat movement. He felt that an opportunity like this was not likely to recur during the next hundred years and so if they failed to avail themselves of it the people of Iodia should have for those hundred years to remain in a down trodden state on account of the continuance of Hindu Moslem jealousies and feods. Hence it was that he thought the Khilafat was intimately bound up with the question of Swarm for Iodia For the attainment of Swarm they must follow the path of peace of only for the reason that India had not the power to use the sword against the English. What little of fighting power remained in India to-day could only be exploited by the English to reduce other countries to their subjection, but it was not competent of itself to win Swaraj He repeatedly warned them therefore that if, as the Government intended, there should be enacted scenes of anarchy and bloodshed in the country, the Government would at one fell sweep destroy their whole movement, and all India would be reduced to such suffering as that of Moplahs of Malabar, who had been giving their lives in hundreds for having killed some half-a-dozen Englishmen in a fit of frenzy At the time of the Punjab atrocities only a comparatively small number of Punjabis had to crawl on their stomachs in a part of a lane in Amritsar, but now, he said, if the people would resort to violence, the same humiliation would be meted out to entire 'India. His suspicion was that the Government might soon arrest the Alı Brothers so that there might not be disorders in the country Then warming up, Mahatmaji said "If the Government wanted to arrest the Alı Brothers to-morrow, I would say let them be taken away this very day. But in the same breath I would call upon the people not to go mad, but to keep their heads cool I demand sacrifice at the hands of my country-But the amount of sacrifice that I demand is far less than what is involved in giving their lives in fighting For if the Ali Brothers are arrested, my demand would be that all the remaining lawyers should give up their practice, all students should boycott the official system of education, and realising that foreign cloth is impure and untouchable, people in general should take to wearing Khaddar, spun and woven by themselves If even this modest sacrifice be beyond the power of this country and if I live to witness this failure then I will proclaim to the world that for India Swaraj is not yet.

After this meeting he went to address a ladies meeting. It was held inside a walled temple. There how ever the screams of little children combined with the talk of the women created a great disturbance. In the old days of the Swadeshi agitation no special effort had been made to enlist the active support of women. In the present movement, however on account of the introduction of the spinning wheel a greater responsibility had naturally been east on them. Nor were they lacking in enthusiasm for work, but the training required tor collective action being wanting at places they were sadly betraying their incapacity to preserve peace and order.

Finding Mahatman alone the next morning (30th August) and not knowing what exactly Prabhudas had told him about me I went up to him and explained the thoughts that had been agitating me Hearing me be replied that I had no reason to think that I was of no special use to him or that public money was being uselessly spent on me. When he would come to think like that, he would not hesitate to tell me about it himself. Then after inquiring about the quantity of food I was taking he said. It is not right that you should starve the body" Then after a pause he added 'You need not worry your health will improve Here he repeated his request that I must attend every one of his meetings When I told him that I could not cope with the crowds and suffered in consequence and that on the previous day on account of the pushing about among the crowd my body was still aching he asked me to keep close to him at all times, and said that with some practice I could learn to avoid the crowds. After this he put into my hand an article in English that he had written for Young India and asked me to find out where the language could be improved. For a moment I thought—Must I sit in judgment over his English. But I soon understood that he wanted to test me. Yet I had to obey his order, and so with extreme diffidence I suggested that in two places I had my doubts. He then read the two passages over again, and made an alteration in one of the two, expressing the opinion that I was right in my examination, there, while as regards the other passage he explained to me, why no alteration was necessary.

At 4P M on that day, Mahatman left Sylhet for Chittagong Before that, at 2 O'Clock he acceived the papils of the National School of Sylhet, and from whom he got all necessary information about the school. Heispecially desired to know if all the pupils did spinning, and he put a number of questions to the teacher in charge of spinning. That gentleman, however, was unable to give satisfactory answers, as he had never learnt how to examine spinning wheels, nor had he any idea of the merits or defects of even his own wheel With a shake of his head, Maliatmaji told the teacher that that kind of teaching would not do at all Noticing also that several boys had put on white Khaddar caps, technically known as Gandhi caps, he asked them why they had done so He told them that the climate of Bengal was such that the wearing of head-dress was not at all necessary. He made the boys understand that, if they must qualify for Swaraj, blind imitation would not do, but in all matters they must learn to judge and act independently.

CHAPTER XV CHITTAGONG

Leaving Sylhet at 4 P M on the 30th August and travelling for a whole night and a whole day Mahatmaji reached Chittagong a little before sunset on the 31st. On the way at the three stations of Comilla Laksam and Feni he received grand ovations. At that time Khaddar was not at all in evidence anywhere in Bengal. The people were still under the obsession that Swadeshi consisted merely in wearing Indian mill-made cloth. Mahatmaji had expected great things of Bengal but he saw that the enthusiasm that was visible everywhere in that province was not fruitful and he was deeply pained at heart to find that the one work which alone could conduce to the welfare of the province and contribute to the success of his movement was still left unattended to

It will be remembered that Mahatmaji towards the end of his address at Sylhet, had suggested a doubt whether his body could survive the country's failure to respond to his call for the comparatively small measure of sacrifice that he thought was needed for the attainment of Swaraj This led to a discussion among his followers in the train and a deep gloom fell on the hearts for us all. It was remembered that he had hinted at the same thing once or twice before. So it became necessary for us to understand what exactly was in his mind. Accordingly Seth Jamnalal Baja jasked him in the train if he really contemplated suicide in case Swaraj was not obtained in the course of the year

Mahatmaji said that he contemplated no such voluntary act. But considering that he was using his body for the purpose of his work beyond its capacities, and considering also that his whole spirit was concentred on that work, he was afraid that his body might collapse under the terrible shock of a failure

At the Laksam station a large body of Mussalmans came to welcome Mahatman They were wearing foreign caps Pained at heart at the sight, Maulana Mahomed Ali exhorted them to surrender the caps so that they might be despatched to Smyrna for the use of the sufferers there. His call was obeyed, and a respectable pile of such caps was made In Assam, owing to the comparatively small number of Mussalmans, foreign caps were not so much in evidence as here in Eastern Bengal, In Assam, however, the Marwaris would come for Mahatmaji's Darshan with foreign turbans, and the volunteers would take advantage of the occasion to collect these for the coming bonfire had seen many of these Marwaris surrendering their turbans not willingly, but either out of courtesy, or from a At the Tinsukia station in Assam, some sense of shame Marwaris, who had handed over their turbans to the volunteers, finding that the volunteers had gone out of sight, went up to Mahatmaji and asked for their return turbans were immediately ordered to be returned reader will be able to see for himself when he will come to read the account of the Bombay riots' in a later chapter what dire consequences followed from this wanton seizing of caps and turbans.

On the way from Sylhet to Chittagong, the enthusiasm * Nov . 17-18, 1921

and excitement among the people was almost unhounded. But sad to relate at no place during the journey was there any provision made for food either for Mahatmaji or his party The result was that for full 24 hours we had to go without food Being a Bengals I was much ashamed to find that the Bengalis with all their capacity for action should have been guilty of this unpardonable neglect of duty When the train reached Feni station at noon the people led Mahatmalı and Maulana Mahomed Alı to a spot on one side of the station where an awning had been put up was only about a dozen yards away but the crowd was so great that it took Mahatman and Maulana Saheb full five or six minutes to walk the short distance Shortly after they had got down the train slowly moved away. As the sound neither of bell nor whistle was heard we thought that it was simply being shunted off a little way from the crowd But the train was leaving the station and the speed also was being increased. So finding that Mahatman and Moulana Saheb were being left hehind three or four of us who were in the train got up and pulled the communicating chain to have it stopped. The train did stop at once when some Eurasian Railway officials came and questioned us foughly Without wasting words with them, we hurned back to bring up Mahatmaji but we had not gone far when we discovered that with snakelike rapidity he himself was advancing towards us, and a whole crowd was following him. As soon as he and Maulana Saheb had got in the train moved on

Thus we reached Chittagong in the evening As Mahatmaji had no food the whole day and as it was getting to be evening Prabhudas and myself instead of accompany ing the procession, hastened by a short cut to our appointed quarters to get ready his evening meal. All the leaders were welcomed and accommodated in the house of Mr J M Sen Gupta Such perfection of arrangement as we noticed here was hardly witnessed by us anywhere else Every detail had been arranged beforehand with careful forethought, and every individual worker had his particular duties assigned to him The detailed programme of the procession from the station had been printed and published before hand We felt at the time that Chittagong, and places round about it, were breathing the very spirit of Swaraj The enthusiasm of the people was then at its height and the capacity for service and sacrifice which they were exhibiting kept pace with their enthusiasm this enthusiasm, and this passion for service and sacrifice, instead of being temporary, could be converted into permanent elements of our national character, then there was no power on earth which could keep such a nation under constraint It was with a view to make them permanent, by accustoming the people to think of the country's welfare, and do something for her everyday, that the duty of spinning had been declared obligatory on all by Mahatmaji So also if his other teachings be carefully examined, it will be found that their one object is to impart strength and practicality to the national character

From the station, he came to his quarters, and finishing his meal, he immediately prepared to leave for the public meeting. Orders under Sec. 144 of the Criminal Procedure Code had been issued by the Magistrate against Mr. Sen Gupta and fourteen of his co-workers, and the question came up before Mahatmaji whether they should obey the order or disobey it and attend the meeting Mahatmaji's tenly was that no one had the right to disober the law un less he had in the first instance learnt to render implicit overlience to it. Therefore he would advise Mr. Sen Gunta and his friends to obey that order as a sort of disciplinary measure. When about to start Mahatmaji noticed me from a distance and called out to me to come along with him But when I got ready and went out I found that he had a'ready left in the company of Maulana Mahomed Ali So I accompanied Seth Jamnalalji in a second car to the place of meeting. Fearing that we had been a little late. I made all haste to get in but when I was there I san Mahatmah standing at the entrance. As soon as he said me he said to me go ahead. At the end of the meeting also he called out to me and enjoined me to go ahead for as he laughingly said to Maulana Mahomed Ali After me the deluge Thus Mahatmajl had kept me in mind ever after I had complained to him at Sylhet about the trouble I had experienced at the hands of the crowd

The picture of that monster gathering in the Moslem Hall grounds of Chittagong remains still imprinted on my memory. This large open space being insufficient for the purpose the audience sat in consecutive rows on the side of a little hill beyond. During the tour I had seen crowds equally big or even bigger, but rarely liad I noticed such perfect order and quiet anywhere else. The meeting opened with the presentation of addresses. One of these was in Hindi in which while describing, Chittagong there occurred Sanskritised sentences like the following.— In this autumn evening in this delightful garden of nature crowned by hills garlanded by rivers and with the sea as her flowing hair", etc * Seeing this attempt to add Hindi terminations to elaborately Sanskiitised Bengali forms, those who were with Mahatmaji fell to laughing, while the two Maulanas, unable to understand one word of it, looked at each other in blank surprise Referring to this matter in his speech, Mahatmaji said, "Hindustani must be the common language of Hindus and Mussalmans in India Without unity of language, it would not be possible to lay firmly the foundations of Hindu-Muslim unity But if the Hindus kept on Sanskritising that language by way of appropriating it to themselves, or if the Mussalmans, in their turn, went on decorating it with Persian forms, such unity could not be preserved for long That is why he advocated pure Hindustani In India, Hindus and Mussalmans could not afford to pursue two different paths, if either of them went its own way, without caring for the other, all our efforts would be futile If a Hindu thought that his community being the largest in number, Swaraj would result in Hindu supremacy, he was grievously wrong Similarly also, if a Mussalman thought that his community was the more powerful community, and that Swaraj would lead to the establishment of the supremacy of his community, he would be equally wrong Swaraj must, in truth, be the common possession of every community in India, be it Hindu, Mussalman, Christian, Jew or Parsi Aye, if there be Englishmen who would accept India as their own country, then also they must be accorded equal rights " Then, after counselling his hearers to preserve the punty of Hindustani Mahatmaji concluded with an exposition of the absolute importance of national self purification and of non-violence and of the boycott of foreign cloth for the winning of Swaraj

He returned from the locating at 10 in the night. The leading men among the promuters of the railway and steamer strikes which were still in progress in Eastern Bengal as a result of the Chandour labour troubles then came and sat in conference with Mahatman which contianed till one O clock in the morning. The stir and excitement in Eastern Bengal which the Government's subuman treatment of the poor uppressed labourers created at the time had not yet faded from our memory. The non-cooperation movement was then at its height, and its influence pervaded the whole country. In the circumstances any measures intended to combat Guvernmental oppression were regarded by the general public as integral parts of the same movement. The ill treatment of the labourers related itself to the three following matters -first the unfair reduction of wages by the tea planters secondly, the Gurklia attack upon them at Chandpur under the orders of the officials and thirdly the refusal by the Steamer Companies to coovey the poor coolles stranded at Chandpur free of charge across the mighty Padma so that they might take train and depart for their homes in Northern India respect of each of these items oothing could be done by the people to fight the teaplanters and as against the bureaucracy save and except Non-co-operation nothing had yet been devised. Finding that there were no chances of a successful campaign in these directions, the local leaders of the Congress had initiated a campaign against the Railway and the Steamer companies These companies suffered, indeed, much loss for the time being, but the Government came at last to their rescue, and they soon recovered their strength. It was being felt that it was an unequal fight with the companies the strikers were waging, reinforced as the companies had been by the resources of the Bengal Government And so the opinion grew in strength that if the strikers were not accorded by the Provincial Congress authorities similar support to what the companies had been receiving from the officials, it was not difficult to foresee, that they could not hold out for long The local leaders of the Congress had become so mextricably involved in these strikes that they could hardly turn their hands to anything else. The terms that were being offered by the companies might lead to a settlement though at the cost of some sacrifice But what was weighing on the mind of the leaders was that the acceptance of those terms meant a confession of defeat on the part of the Congress authorities in Bengal In this predicament the Bengal leaders came to Mahatmaji, asking for approval and support of their actions. No pains were spared by them to persuade Mahatmaji to accept the strikes as an integral part of the Non-co-operation movement Mahatmaji fully sympathised with the leaders in the difficult and responsible situation which had thus arisen Nevertheless his regret was that in that part of the country the strikes had led to a set back to the progress of the original movement If the succeeded, would that in any way benefit the country as a whole? Even if the companies expressed legret for their conduct and unconditionally re-admitted all their employees, and if the Steamer companies refunded the money they had charged for conveying the coolies across the river how would all that contribute to the attainment of Swaraj Mahatman's non-co-operation movement was an open direct challenge to the Government but here these strikes had provided an excellent opportunity to the latter to take slielter beland the Railway and the Steamer companies and tight the non-co-operators under cover. Further If the strikers finally decided not to go back to their work there was the problem of devising means to enable them to earn a livelihood. After giving due weight to all sides of the question. Mahatman a decision was that if the strike was the result of a genuine sympaths for the oppressed coolies no striker should to back to his old work as long as Govern ment remained impendent and as long as the Steamer companies refused to refund the fares they had taken from the Assam coolies. For in such situation it was the most natural thing for all sympathisers to non co-operate with the companies cheerfulls submitting to the sacrifices involved For those who after mature consideration decided to live independently refusing to go back to work under the companies Maliatmaji would suggest the establishment of a Colony of strikers and the starting of a spinning and weaving factors for their maintenance. Mahatmali met the strikers at a meeting the next morning. He gave them to understand that hitherto he had expressed no definite opinion against these strikes. Before he came to Chittagong he had not been in possession of all the facts. It was now that he learned for the first time that the strike had been undertaken by way of protest against the oppression practis ed upon the coolles at Chandpur and that it had been prompted by no selfish ends. Never before had he come across people belonging to their class so readily throwing up their means of livelihood as a mark of their sympathy with the sufferings of their oppressed countrymen. If, therefore, he said, these strikes were the result of genuine sympathy, their object was sacred and no words of praise were too It behoved them therefore to keep to their high for them vow as long as the wrongs on the poor coolies remained But the lustre of their sacrifice would grow unredressed dim, if instead of standing on their own feet, they leaned on the Congress for pecuniary support. His advice to them, therefore, was that they must learn to use then own hands and feet to get for themselves an independent living, instead of being dependent on the Congress for pecuniary help. In that connection he pointed out to them that if they took to spinning and weaving they would have an easy means of earning their livelihood. Then, he enjoined upon them all to accord their forgiveness to those among their associates who had gone back to their old work. He pointed out to them that his previous experiences about strikes were not inconsiderable In South Africa, for instance, under his leadership, some forty thousand labourers had gone on strike, some ten thousand of whom had to undergo imprisonment while a considerable number had to undergo flogging Nevertheless, in the end they had won, and the secret of that winning was that they had stuck to Truth and Justice as their motto, and had remained uniformly nonviolent So his last earnest advice to the strikers would be, h

^{*} The question of sympathetic strikes is discussed at considerabl length by Mahatmaji in an article in Young India The full text of is given in the Appendix to this volume

coocloded by saying that they should remain non-violent and preserve the peace

Early at dawn oo the 1st September the boys of the local Saraswat Ashram came to Mahatmaji, singing sweet songs led by Mr Nripendra Chandra Banerji formerly Vice Principal of the local Government College who had turned a ooo co-operator. They presented an address to Maliatmali. and made him a gift of a spinning wheel macofactured at their own Ashram Theo the whole day s work was taken up with meetings in succession. First there was the strikers meeting next a Ladies meeting then a khilafat meeting then a meeting of the Chittagong Merchants Association and so oo Mahatmaji was also shown round the city. It was no altogether new side of Mahatmaji s character that presented itself before my eyes here at Chittagong Hitherto for the most part I had seen him sliting patiently hour after hour wholly rotent upon work But now it was a revelation to me, that he could finish meet ing after meeting and get through all his engagements so quickly. This astonishing promptness of despatch struck me as something extraordinary. Thus did he spend the whole day at Chittagong and his work done he left for Barisal by the eveolog truin

CHAPTER XVI

Passing the whole of the night in the train, Mahatmaji arrived at the Chandpur Ghat station on the morning of the 2nd September Chandpur is the terminus of a branch line on the Assam Bengal Railway, and the journey from there to Barisal had to be made by steamer Chandpur is a town standing on a bank of the broad Meghna In previous June, the coolies of the Assam tea-gardens, starting on their exodus homewards, had found themselves stranded here, and here at the station itself they were the victims of a bayonet charge at the hands of the armed Gurkha police Mahatman was shown the very spot under official oiders where on that dreadfully dark night the cruel attack on the unsuspecting Assam coolies was launched. As there were some three or four hours still remaining for the steamer to start, the leading men of the place took Mahatmaji to a couple of meetings in the town, and also showed him round the local National School The school had been established at the time of the Partition by the well-known leader of Chandpur, Mr Haradayal Nag, and having been kept up all along through his efforts, had now regained new life under the impulse of the present movement

Chandpur is my native place, and my father, Mr Radlia Madhav Sinha Ray, is a respectable citizen of the place, ever forward in constructive national work. It was the example of his unostentatious labours for the good of his fellowmen, and for the uplift of the country, that had since my boyliood, acted as a stimulus on me and made me anxious to join the national movement. Seeing that there was to be a stay of some three or four hours here I took Mahatmaji s permission and went to pay my respects to my parents returning with their benedictions.

The way from Chandpur to Barisal was a delight to the eyes. On all sides rivers abounded and wherever we cast a glance nothing but water was to be seen while beyond, the fertile earth adorned with fruits and vegetation soothed the vision by her green loveliness. Methinks nowhere clse in all India such a wonderfully harmonious association of land and water could be seen. All torgot their fatigue under the touch of the pure gentle breeze of the river.

The steamer reached Barisal nt five in the evening. The lauding place was guarded by a formidable array of police force carrying long lathus in their hands and casting sterile looks on all and sundry. Outside the police belt the public of Barisal took, their stand. They received Mahatmaji and the other leaders and took them round in a procession When the procession had left and the crowd dispersed Jamnadas, Prabhudas. Hirowe Mr. Haya. Secretary to Maulana Mahomed Alli, Parasuram (Pagal, and myself proceeded by another route to our appointed quarters.

Jost as at Chittagong the question of the Railway strike had become the chiefest problem there monopolising all time energy resources and attention of the public, so also at Barisal there were some outstanding problems of equal improtance awaitlog settlement and solution. Ever sloce the Swadeshi era Barisal had become almost a place of pil grimage for all Bengal. The present movement also had reatly stirred the people here. The Chandpur steamer strike in connection with the Assain coolies had also had its repercussion here, and it was still being vigorously kept up at Barisal While at Sylliet a letter from Barisal had reached Mahatmaji requesting him to respect the strike by refusing to use the Company's steamer service. On receipt of the letter Mahatmaji had enquired of me if I knew anything of the state of the strike, and if it was at all possible for him to reach Barisal by any other route.

Besides the steamer strike, a number of hartals had been held at Bairsal one after another in quick succession Mahatmaji also came to learn that in that connection Government officials and loyalists had been harassed by the people cutting off their supplies As a result, a "District Propaganda Committee" had been formed at Barisal to work against Non-co-operation A moslem youth came to see Mahatmaji on behalf of this Committee and began arguing that the Khilafat movement had no basis whatsoever, as the treaty between the Allies and Turkey was in no way prejudicial to Islam As the youth was eager to enter into a controversy, Mahatmaji enquired of him if his view had the sanction of any mussalmans divine, or whether it was his personal view that he was putting forward. The youth made a reference to the opinion of a famous Maulana of Behar, but Mahatmaji replied that that particular Maulana was now a supporter of the Khilafat movement youth, when he left, craved protection, lest the volunteers should handle him roughly Then, at the public meeting itself while Mahatmaji was speaking, two other mussalman gentlemen stood up and complained that they were being harassed in various ways for their want of sympathy with Non-co-operation Besides this several letters had been received by Mahatmaji from the District Propaganda Committee aboot which the opinion of the general public of Barisal was that it was not a genuine thing enjoying as it did official protection and support

The high state of organization and discipline to which the volunteers of Barral had attained was something excentional As Moulana Mahomed Ali said in his speech Barisal to that respect beat even Chittagong. We found the volunteers standing along the roads marking time with their steps like soldiers. One of these having succeeded after many attempts in getting an opportunity to talk to him in private told Maliatman that the volunteers had a greater attraction for the methods of violence than for the ways of peace, which Mahatmali advocated From a single day a stay it was not possible for us to find out how far this might be true bot the kind of military termation and demeanour of the police at Barisal at the time of our nerval as well as of our departure we had seen nowhere else and the question arose in my miod whether all this might not have been a reply to the general attitude of the local volunteers

An entirely novel kind of problem came op here before Mahatmajl for solution. A considerable number of the prostitutes of Barisal had paid in their subscriptions and joined the Congress as members. They had cootributed also to the Tifak Swiraj Fund. They now waoted to know if they were eligible to become office-bearers to the Congress and in that coonection prayed to have an interview with Mahatmajl. This proposal made him thooghtful. After a while he spoke as follows.— Barisal is a small town the number of prostitutes here must be small. If they be some eight or tun we may appoint an hoor for them. But when

Then Bengal taking the Swadeshi son halt to depend on the Bombay and Ahmedabad mills for the supply of her own needs, that is why that the older movement had not succeeded. Now however they were being required to spin their own varn and weave their own cloth, without which the present agitation so far as Bengal was concerned was also bound to fail. The Bengali's now continued Mahatmaji must aspire to be hardy even like the sturdy coole or labourer. To they had degenerated into a pleasure-losing people. They had lost their capacity for enduring physical hardships. They even dreaded to have to were course cloth. And so it would be extremely difficult for Bengalis to win Swaraj, if they fuled to shed these weak nesses—such was list firm conviction, said Mahatmaji.

Having thus disau sed the three fundamental conditions of Swarai he proceeded to noswer some of the ques tions put to him by the District Propaganda Committee These questions had been printed and forwarded to him but the letters were all unsigned and he did not know who the organisers of the Committee were or where they could be found. Mahatmaji had expressed an opinion against the Railway and Steamer strikes of Eastern Bengal but he had not taken steps to prevent the misuse of Congress money in continuing the strikes. That was the nest charge levelled against him. Her reply was as follows - He could never support a strike if its object was elfele or if it was meant to be a protest against the impresonment of a leader. But if it became necessary to organise a strike in the interests of Swami or to further this movement of non-co-operation then certainly he would support such a strike. It was his belief that the present strike in Eastern Bengul had done from earning his own livelihood by the independent exercise of his own capacities and his own lutelligence had not the nower to stand on their own feet how could they hope to win Swarze or to retain it when it was won? He took for an illustration the case of a seed endowed with vital power which even when cast on rocky soil would germinate and sprout up. He therefore felt convinced that those who had left their school or college with a real understanding of what this movement stood for namely to earn their freedom would know how to devise means of earning their livelihood without becoming a dependant on Government. For the present he held that on those young men who had adopted non-co-operation with the definite object of winning Swarai or Freedom there lay the para mount duty of devoting some eight or nine hours every day to spinning and weaving these being in his opinion the most important instruments at their disposal for the attainment of such Swara: That would also coble them to carn their livelihood and he believed in his heart of licerts that their object being unselfish and their work being pure God himself would bless their efforts.

Then after answering some two or three further questions all relating to the recent hartals at Barisal he took up the Committee's question on Swadeshi. The question was fairly long. The cotton mill owners of Bombay might have contributed handsomely to the Tilak Swaraj Fund but were they not clearly prompted by the hope to reap a rich harvest of the movement in favour of the boycott of foreign cloth gained the upper hand? Secondly Mahatmaji might be preaching a boycott of foreign cloth but the question was whether in India there was sufficient provision to meet the demand for cloth for the whole of India Lastly, assuming that the boycott proved a success under the impulse of the Swadeshi idea, and the destruction of India's foreign trade ensued, was it not worth Mahatmaji's consideration to envisage the evil results that were bound to follow?

Mahatman replied that the insinuation against the Bombay mill-owners contained in the first part of the question was unfounded, and wholly unfair. Their contribution to the Tilak Swaraj Fund did not amount to much, nor could they hope to achieve any selfish ends under cover of this movement. For the call upon the people of each province was that they must manufacture their own cloth Further, if it was to be real Swadeshi, then Barisal must produce its own cloth, without indenting on Bombay for the same It was to him a matter of profound regret that in Barisal, with its population of twenty thousand souls, a couple of hundred spinning wheels only were at work. He expressed the hope that Barisal should soon have a minimum of four thousand spinning-wheels and a thousand looms actually at work, so that Barisal might not have to depend on Bombay or Ahmedabad for its supply of cloth

Referring to the second and third parts of the question, Mahatmaji said it hurt him to the quick to have such questions put, for he honestly believed that for no other purpose but that of concealing the truth all this web of words had been woven. He was not opposed to foreign trade as such. Boycott of foreign cloth did not mean boycott of all foreign trade. India would certainly, said he, import what she required for her growth, and export what she did not need. There was no bar to our importing such things as glassware and machiners from foreign countries but to import cloth from abroad was as absurd as to think of importing from abroad, the oxygen for nur body. Then warming up to the subject, he exclaimed - Who was it that supplied India her clothing a century and a half ago before the advent of British rule. If India provided her own clothing in those days who is there to prevent her from doing the same thing now? Must we begin sending our corn abroad to be ground into meal and manufactured into biscuits? When this penale would feel inclined to take to this course then we must take it for granted that it is modily advancing along the road to ruln. The same law applies in the matter of clotlung. Cotton is produced in one country, but we send it abroad to be manufactured into cloth. We are rapidly losing the virtues of industry nationce and manlood and so we have come to regard spinning and weaving as work entailing hardship. And we blind ourselves to the daily growing degradation of our country which has followed as a natural consequence. If It so happened in course of time that our women began to grudge the labour of cooking and preferred to have their food cooked in hotely then the conclusion would be inevitable that the moral foundations of India's life were glylng was and India's women were in danger I losing their time-honoured virtue of chastity. God has endowed us with hands and fect not that we inight remain idle but that we may work. If then people ceased to use them then rest assured that they should be visited with loss of character as a proper retribution. I have said on many an occasion before and I will repeat It here that the work of cultivation and the work of spinning and weaving are as the two lungs of our national body. If, therefore, equal attention be not paid to them, or if either of them is neglected and gets atrophied for want of use, then this body politic cannot hope to live for long."

The last question was a sort of a personal question which Mahatmaji was called upon to answer. He was first informed that those very persons who shouted his name and were given to crying 'Victory to Mahatma Gandhi'-it was those very persons who had engineered these hartals time after time causing endless suffering to the general public This led up to the question,-"Was it agreeable for Mahatman to hear these shouts and cries?" To this Mahatman made the following feeling reply He said,-"When I hear cries of "Victory to Mahatma Gandhi", every sound of the phrase pierces my heart like an arrow. If only I thought for a moment that these shouts could win Swarai for you, I could reconcile myself to my misery But when I find that peoples' time and energy was spent in mere useless shouting, while at the same time real work was given the go-by, how I wish that they should, instead of shouting my name, prepare and light up a funeral pyre for me and that I might leap into it, and once for all extinguish the fire that is scorching up my heart!"

It was late in the evening when he returned home from the meeting. On the first floor was Mahatmaji's room, but one must pass through our room to enter it. About 10 PM Mahatmaji went and sat for a while on the terrace in front of his room. Then I saw some women enter our room and pass on to the terrace. They were soon followed by batch after batch of women. The volunteers who had conducted them to the terrace waited there to hear the conversation. Mahatman did not like this at all and so with an emphatic Go Go all of you must go made them all leave the place Hirowe and I who were in Mahatman s room also came away Going downstairs we heard from Seth Jamnalalu that the women were the prostitutes of Barisal who had come to meet Mahatmail by appointment. They had a couple of honrs interview with Mahatmaji before they came downstairs when advancing a little some of them offered their salutations to Jamualalii From their looks I could guess that they had been overpowered by a feeling of reverence for Mahatmaji. Mahatmaji gave an account of this interview with the Fallen Sisters of Barisal in an article in Young fudia Calculating on the basis of population as applicable to Barisal, he estimated that there must be ten and a half lakhs of these staters in all India. If they left off their sin and dedicated themselves to the country s good and by way of livelihood took to spinning and weaving it would mean a daily income of one million and fifty thousand rupees for India calculating at the rate of a rupee one per head per dlem. But who is there that would take up the work of their reclamation? Addressing those whom he saw were keen on this particular work in Barisal he gave the warning that this work must not be undertaken in a spirit of over confidence nor by any except such as were advanced in age and had acquired the necessary experience and grit of character

Mahatmaji left Barisal on the evening of the 3rd September. On the very day of armyal in Barisal he had paid a visit to Babu Aswin Kumar Dutt and now on the day of his departure he paid a second visit. Here at Barisal he was very pleased to note the excellent arrangements for spinning and weaving at the National school and weaving Institute Besides he had a number of special meetings to attend. At the Merchants' meeting, the Ladies' meeting, the Strikers meeting, the Congress Workers meeting, the Khilafat meeting, and the Volunteers meeting, he advised the members on their work. His advice to the Barisal strikers was identical with that he had given to the strilers at Chittagong To the Congress Workers his advice was that they must consider the production and distribution of Khaddai as their chief duty and he also told them that it was his heart's prayer that they might succeed in forming a new "East India Company on the basis of khaddar business. He complimented the volunteers on the consummate ability they had shown in maintaining order and discipline, but he regretted that he had heard that some of them were not advocates of non-violence. He pointed out to them that if they but swerved a hair's breadth from the path of peace, the whole movement would collapse in no time After spending the whole day in this strenuous fashion, he left Barisal toi Khulna by the evening steamer. There was an immense throng on board the steamer, and all were eager to see Mahatmaji He and Maulana Mahomed Ali, then, came down from the upper deck, and for a while freely moved about among the people. The whole of the night was passed in the steamer. Next morning we reached Khulna where a large crowd had assembled outside the station to pay their respects to Mahatmaji We were then hurrying back to Calcutta, and we took the train to Calcutta immediately after At the Dum Dum station we met Mrs Urmila Devi, Mi Jitendralal Banerji and others, who had come to receive and escort Mahatmaji, Maulana and Begum

Mahomed Alı and Maulana Azad Sobhani to Calcutta by motor The rest of us reached Sealdah by train at about 11 (on the 4th September) In Calcutta we were this time the iguests of Mr C R Das

CALGUTTA---I

Leaving Calcutta on the 17th August, and finishing his Assam and Eastern Bengal tour, Mahatmaji and party returned to Calcutta on the 4th September We had all been feeling more or less the strain of these sixteen days' fatiguing journey, attended as it was with loss of sleep, and arregularaties in food, etc. No praise could be too high for the admirable spirit in which Begum Mahomed Ali had borne all these discomforts on the way. She had to sit behind the purdah at all time, while at the time of appearing in public, she had to cover herself from head to foot with a veil of course khaddar. Only those who have experienced the heats of August in Eastern Bengal could realise her sufferings in those circumstances. On the top of all this it was not even her privilege to enjoy the small restricted freedom enjoyed by men to move about freely in train or steamer. But, in spite of it all, she was behind none in cheerfully submitting to all these discomforts. Maulana Azad Sobhani's countenance had turned almost dark under the influence of the Bengal climate He was deeply learned in Muslim lore, and loved to spend all his time in religious study and meditation. He had hardly time to look after his luggage, there was not even a lock and key to his trunk As Maulana Mahomed Alı humorously remarked, he had not the faintest notion of what things get into his trunk, or what things went out of it His graceful form had suffered from the dust and sand and smoke on the way. The calm face and imposing frame of Seth Jannalalji had also become worn and thin. At Calcutta our party dispersed. Jannalalji went with his party to his sbopat Barabazar. The Maulanas Mahomed. Ali and Azad Sobhani though they were the guests of Desabadbu Das. had to spend most of their time among their co-religionists, enlisting their support for the Non-co-operation movement, and collecting subscriptions for the Khilafat. Fund, while Jannadas, and Prabbudas ured of eating Bengali disbes all these days took to visiting the homes of their Guzarati friends and relations in Calcutta.

Arriving in Calcutta I learnt that we were to proceed to Madras after a week's rest Seth Jamnalalji and his associates would not accompany Mahatmaji to Madras but would stay in Calcutta and work to get the cloth dealers boycott foreign cloth Honever for one reason or another it was not possible to keep to our time-table and our stay in Calcutta was prolonged by two days. This no doubt gave the party good rest, but what rest could Mahatmaji have? The whole city and suburbs were astir over his visit. Distinguished leaders from different parts of the country had begun to arrive to attend the meeting of the Working Committee that had already been announced to be held in Calcutta It was then the beginning of September Mahat maji had in the course of his speeches at one or two places declared his belief that in case the boycott of foreign cloth was completed by the end of that mouth Swaraj could be established in October The people had too much respect for and faith in him to disbelieve that declaration, but at the same time they could hardly see how the anticipation could possibly be fulfilled This prolonged spell of India's political subjection, this powerful British Government, could all this vanish in one single night like the baseless fabric of a dream? Not caring to remember the conditions that Mahatmaji had laid down for the winning of Swaraj, people went about repeating the cry that Swaraj was about to come, for Mahatmaji had promised it Not for once thinking about their own responsibility in the matter they were spending their days in breathless expectation Among the leaders that had come to attend the Working Committee meeting was Lala Lappat Rai, the Lion of the He arrived when Mahatmaji was engaged in writing something in his room behind closed doors was waiting in the verandah in front of Mahatmaji's room, and conversing with some of the other leaders was serious, and his naturally small eyes seemed as though they had become smaller still under the weight of heavy thought On his lips, too, was the anxious question-"What next? What next? What does Mahatman propose to do next ?"

During his stay of nine days at Calcutta from the 4th September (morning) to the 13th September (morning), Mahatmaji had no respite from incessant consultation and discussion, except only on the 5th and the 12th, which being Mondays were days of silence for him. But even on those two days he was busy writing his articles for Young India and Navajivan, and so he had no real rest. Long sittings of the Working Committee took place behind closed doors in Mahatmaji's room on the four days, the 6th, the 7th, 8th and 11th. He had, besides, to attend almost daily meetings in different parts of the city. It is specially worthy of notice that on the evenings of both the 8th and the 11th as many as five meetings were held simultaneously in five different parts of the city and that Mahatmali had to address every one of these five meetings. It was so late as nine or ten in the night before he could address the last of them An Anglo-Indian paper of Calcutta could not help expressing its astonishment that thousands and thousands of people coold thus sit patiently waiting hour after hour in expectation of Mahatman s arrival. One day the drivers of bullock carts held a meeting of their own at Mirzapur Park and then formally made a present to Maliatmaji of ten thousand rupces for the Tilak Swarai Fund Again the Onva cooles of Bara Bazar at meeting after meeting of their own took the Swadeshi von and promised not to handle the bales of foreign cloth imported by the Marwari merchants of Bara Bazar Lvery meeting had now for its prime object the propagation of Swadeshi and the boycott of foreign cloth

Taking tright at all this agritation against foreign cloth the Marwari merchants of Bara Bazar called a meeting of their Association and by wav of placating public feeling made an announcement that they had made up their miod not to import foreign cloth up till the end of December But they did not succeed in attracting the sympathies of the public to them nor was Mahatmaji himself pleased when he heard of this opportunist declaration. Then the foreign piece-goods dealers of Colootola invited Mahatmaji to a meeting of their own and sought his advice in the difficult situation they were placed. They declared that they were not wanting in sympathy and enthusiasm but there were so many obstacles in the way which made it difficult to carry out the boycott effectively. Mahatmaji's advice to them was threefold. Firstly they might after making the necessary announcement to that effect, dispose of all their existing stock of foreign cloth. Or, secondly, they might suspend their sale till Swaraj was attained. Or, thirdly, if that was at all practicable, the goods might be returned to the wholesale dealers. But in no case should there be the slightest attempt made to cheat the wholesalers by the adoption of questionable tactics.

In the meanwhile, a few days petore Mahatmaji's airival here, picketting the foreign cloth shops with the help of volunteers had commenced in right earnest. That distinguished Mussalman leader scholar author and orator, Maulana Abul Kalam Azad, was now leading this movement of picketting I saw the Maulana Sahib almost every day coming to Mahatmaji with long strides, tucking up his sleeves to render an account to him of the day's work After Mahatman's return to Calcutta some of the picketting volunteers were arrested at Bara Bazar, but the enthusiasm for picketting instead of waning began to grow higher and higher. The Marwari traders now thought of persuading Mahatmaji to order that picketting should stop. They came to him and declared that if the picketting continued they could no longer sympathise with his movement Again, if their customers wanted foreign cloth, how could they help it? They were bound to meet the demands of their customers, nor was foreign cloth poison that it could not be supplied to a customer

After hearing all their arguments Mahatmaji said that if he had been here in Calcutta when picketting had commenced, he would have tried to come to an understanding with the dealers and have the picketting postponed for a while But now that it had begun, he saw oo reasons to advise stopping it, so loop of course as no violence was attempted by the picketters To the best of his knowledge. the volunteers had behaved admirably so far and Seth Jamnalal Bajaj would see to it that their foture behaviour was conally blameless. Mahatmail further told the foreign cloth dealers that they were mistaken if they thought that trade and commerce shoold have oothing to do with Iodian political movement. For they must be aware that the foundations of the politics of the English people were laid in their commerce and that the national political life of England was closely intertwined with the protection and development of that commerce. The view that it was the business of sellers to provide for the particular demands of their customers might be good enough for the West, but It could not hold good in the case of India. Were not the Marwari community prepared even to sacrifice their very lives for the protection of the cow? If so and assuming customers demanded beef were they prepared to meet their demand? Again if their customers wanted to boy wine would they set on as wine-merchants? The foundations of Hindu relimon were laid in renunciation and self control as principles of daily action Therefore if as Hiodus, they wanted to carry on their trade without preindice to their religion they should certainly discriminate between what was good and what was evil in trade. In reply to their contention that foreign cloth was no poison that it should be a sin to supply it to a customer Mahatmali declared that it was undoubtedly true that they honestly held that view for they were used to sell foreign cloth for an unconscion ably long time But he would ask them to probe the matter a little deeply. They would then find that ordinary poisons acted only on the physical body and at the worst, would kill it—a contingency which, comparatively speaking, could be contemplated with equanimity. But the degration of the soul of a whole people, which the use of foreign cloth by Indians involved, was too horrible to contemplate Firstly, the use of imported cloth had cut off one prime source of income to our people, and had brought poverty in its train to the masses Next, Mahatmaji asked them if they had taken into account another terrible consequence flowing from it. How many of them had the remotest inkling that, deprived of the means of eking out their living by spinning, many of the poorer women of our country had taken to selling their virtues to secure a living Lastly, said Mahatmaji they must not forget that it was this clothindustry alone that had enabled England to keep India in subjection Therefore, if the Marwari community should carefully look below the surface, and realise the significance of all that he had said, it would not be difficult for them to understand why it was that he regarded it as sin to deal in foreign cloth Then after paying a tribute to them for their commercial intelligence, their practical genius, and their fear of Adharma (sinful acts), Mahatmaji exhorted them to set about devising means to supply the nation's need by preparing cloth out of Indian handspun yarn, for he held that, if Marwar so chose, she alone could provide the whole of India with Khaddar

Although Mahatmaji's time and energy were now almost wholly concentrated on the boycott propaganda, in view of his resolve to put a stop to the import of foreign cloth

mto India by the end of September yet he had to find time to attend to some of the local problems of Bengal The one question which for the time as we have already hinted overshadowed all others in Bengal was that of the Railway and Steamer strikes of Eastern Bengal He had already made a declaration of his views in regard to the strikes both at Chittagong and at Barisal But arriving in Calcutta he found that discussion and agitation of the question was still as active as ever and so he was called npon to make a formal pronouncement. In a statement to the Press over his signature he now publicly gave out that since it was abundantly clear that the strikers were prompted by no selfish considerations but solely by sympathy for the sufferings of the exiled coolies no settlement of the strike was possible so long as the parties concerned failed to apologise for their illtreatment of the coolies and so long also as they failed to refund the fares so unjustly levied from them. In the same coonection he also expressed the opinion that in view of the fact that the Provincial Congress Committee had so far taken upon themselves the responsible lity of financing the strike at was their clear duty to provide the necessary fonds whether for repatriation or by way of provision to enable the strikers to start some spinning and weaving bosiness. With the issue of this statement, the strike agitation was laid to rest. About this time however the news of the forced conversions of Hindus by the Monlah rebels of Malabar began to arrive and there was danger of the recrudescence of Hindu Moslem tension in different parts of the country Mahatmali had repeatedly laid emphasis on the fact that, unless there was amity established between Hindus and Moslems in India Swaraj was an impossibility and now the whole group of Anglo-Indian papers in Calcutta started giving warning to the Hindus, that directly the British rule ceased in India, Hindus would be the victims of a similar course of oppression at the hands of the Mussalmans to what had happened in Malabar. Lest the efforts of these European papers, should produce an unsettling effect on the minds of Hindus, Maulana Maliomed Ali in his Mirzapur Park speech showed by quoting from the Koran that forced conversions were not countenanced by Islam

The old revolutionary party of Bengal noting all the stir and ferment about them began to fancy that the times were propitious for the realisation of their dreams. They could hardly get themselves to understand the significance of Mahatman's methods and action They were wholly unable to reason out how non-violent methods could at all lead to India's emancipation Some even went so far as to imagine that all this talk of non-violence was a mere political manoeuvre on the part of Mahatmaji, and that when the hour had struck Mahatmaji would come out in his true colours. and play the part of a grim revolutionary. Therefore, thought they, it was time to tell Mahatmaji that the hour for action had arrived, and that it was not right to delay action any longer About this time one day Deshabandu Das came and told Mahatmaji with a laugh-"The Violent School?—the violent school exists only in name" Mahatmaji was not feeling quite easy about Bengal had had great hopes of Bengal, but now he was giving vent to his feeling of mortification that, partly because of the excitement caused by the strikes, and partly because of the lack of faith among the workers in the methods of non-violence, Bengal, instead of keeping pace with the rest of India, was falling behind in the race. It was increasingly becoming clear to him that Bengal of all the provinces had not accept ed with the necessary amount of wholeheartedness the remedies he had prescribed to get rid of the root causes of that weakness and servility which lay at the root of Indian national character.

The result of all this was that while the work of bladdar production and Charkha propaganda were proceeding apace in the other provinces progress in Bengal was. comparatively speaking little or nothing. The strike had swallowed up the collections of the Tilak Swarsi Fund amounting to about six lakhs, whereas in the other provinces the collections were being spent primarily on the furtherance of spinning and weaving But although this was so Bengali intelligence was not lying idle. It was, however confined to devising newer and newer types of Charlina Thus almost in each district visited by Mahatmaji a special variety of Charkha had been shown to him In Calcutta also he was one day taken to a Charkha Exhibition at the National College. where various types of spinning wheels were exhibited. But nobody could explain to Mahatman what were the special ments or the defects of each one of these varieties of wheels. Nor were there anything to tell what real progress had been achieved by Bengal in the matter of yarn production Mahatman therefore now wrote an article under the title of Wanted Experts which he sent for publication in Young India In that article be first explained the virtues of the spinning wheel in their special aspects political economic moral and spiritual and then from a practical point of view emphasised the urgent need that existed of each Province in India having its own body of experts to test the quality of every charkha used. These experts must not be mere experts, so called, but must have qualified themselves by hard, practical apprenticeship in spinning. For this purpose the future expert must begin his apprenticeship by spending eight hours every day on spinning. He affirmed his conviction that when once Bengal had thoroughly realised the greatness of the Charklia, she would cling to it with such passionate devotion that she would leave behind in the race every other Province For it is an indisputable historical fact, said Mahatmaji, that in the past Bengal was the most skilled in the artistic manufacture of cloth. But now she must build up her spinning anew One day Deshabandhu Das reported a story to Maliatmaji of an old woman whom he had met, who firmly believed that if once again a Charkha was manufactured, the police would come and break it in pieces, and apply fire to it. As Mr. Das said, the poor woman had still retained a recollection of the highhanded methods which had been employed to destroy the old cloth industry of Bengal Hearing this, Mahatmaji said with a laugh that he would be mightily pleased if the Government once more thought of destroying the Charkha, as that would leave an indelible impress upon the people's mind as to the real value of the Charkha

CALCUTTA-II

Vahatmaji s present visit to Bengal was giving him an insight into the varied forces that stood in the way of Bengal's progress in this movement. He had forfeited the sympathies of many practising lawyers by expressing the opinion that no practising lawyer could become an office bearer on the Congress Executive The late Mr Motilal Ghosh editor of the America Basar Patrika summoned him from his sick-bed and specially requested him to see that the lawyers were not kept out of the movement. So also only a few days before Mahatmaji's return to Calcutta from his Assam tour the Poet Rabindranath Tagore, had read a paper at the Calcutta University Institute inverghing against the spinning wheel on the plea that it contained within it the seeds of India s degeneration And when such a world-famed man as the great poet came out mto the open, the enemies of the Non-co-operation movement came forward to attack it with added energy Mr C. F. Andrews friend and sometime co-worker of Mahatmaji in South Africa the very soul of pity and love was associated with the Poet's work at the Bolpur Ashram He looked upon Mahatmaji with as much love and reverence as upon the Poet. He himself was working hard for the Non-co-opera tion movement. He was now much exercised to find the Poet ranged against Mahatmaji and acting as a mediator took Mahatmaji to the Poet's Calcutta home on the morning of the 6th September A private discussion on the subject of Non-co-operation lasting full three hours was held between them, but on Mahatman's return we heard that nothing had been gained by the interview. The poet had his say first, and then Mahatmaji explained his point of view, and when they parted, they agreed to differ Nobody actually knew the details of the talk, but the general public were treated to all soits of rumours, and even the newspapers began to publish stories of the interview A certain European owned paper proclaimed that Mahatmaji had been beaten in argument by the Poet Another paper gave out that Mahatman had confessed to the Poet that he did not really believe it was possible for India to win Swaraj within the space of a twelve month, but that he had made that sort of declaration only as a matter of policy to help on the movement This was the signal of an attack on Mahatmaji ın some papers To get at the truth or otherwise of these stories, a representative of the Servant newspaper of Calcutta interviewed Mahatmaji He told the interviewer that the demand of the public to know what passed between individuals at a private conference was hardly justifiable Secondly, seeing that these stories were set affoat to belittle him and his movement, he was not prepared on any account to make any self-defence He could safely leave his honour to be defended by the Poet himself Subsequently, on another day, the question was put to him if he had at all told the Poet that he had not believed in the possibility of Swaraj within a year, to which he made the reply that he had said nothing of the sort This reply came to be published in the papers Then on another day, Mr Andrews came to Mahatmaji and showed him a letter written by the Poet, which was to be sent to the local Englishman newspaper for publication. That letter contained an indignant repudiation by the Poet of all the accusations that were being circulated against Mahatmaji. Mr. Andrews state of mind at the time was, indeed miserable and he felt the misery most keenly. He was grieved to find that not only had the Poet declared himself in opposition to the movement but his own efforts to reconcile them instead of doing any good had resulted in a campaign of misrepresent ation against Mahatmaji with a view to discredit his movement. In this connection, I heard Mahatmaji saying one day. Poor Andrews is suffering mental torture being caught up by two opposing currents.

All these days Mahatmaji was so much occupied with outside discussions meetings, and other work relating to the movement that we of this party could not talk to him or even hear him talk Almost every evening he would go out to attend some meeting or other, and during midday he sat in consultation with the Working Committee behind closed doors while in the morning he took to silence to get through his writing work. At this time if any of us approached him on some special business, he would not open bis line, but would give a very brief answer in writing Without some previous practice it was difficult to read his handwriting Maulana Mahomed Ali could not as a rule make out his handwriting Coming to him one morning on some business the Maulana found himself in sore straits Mahatman would be writing his answer in pencil and the Maulana would go on struggling through the tortuous peucil Writing and would take out his specs and rubbing his eyes would stammer out the words And Mahatman would be looking at the stupendous, heroic figure of the Maulana with a fixed gaze, and as I suspected, he would be thoroughly enjoying the situation. On another day, Mr. Hayat, the Maulana Salub's Secretary coming on an errand to Mahatmaji when he was silent, and not being able to make out his pencil-written answers had to end his business somehow, and coming outside said, "Bapu is getting more and more atrocious every day. All this while Deshabandliu Das's mansion would be filled with a constant stream of visitors, who came to talk to him, or to have merely a view of him from a distance. The more prominent among these would go upstairs, and await his leisure day, Mis Urmila Devi, Deshabandu's sister, after waiting for a long time to tell him something, came to us and said, "Mahatmaji is our guest, and yet we cannot talk to him even five minutes, he is so monopolised by other people at all times" Mr. Mahadov Desai, had at this time come down from Allahabad Mahatmaji himself had summoned him, but even he could not get the opportunity to speak to Mahatmaji And so I heard him say in terms of loving complaint, "If it comes to this, what need was there to have summoned me all the way from Allahabad "?

In the midst of all this bustle, we had no other business than to be constantly in readiness for his orders. One day, Maulana Malionied Ali called me, and said, "Look here, Krishnadas, your Bengali people hate me for nothing Just look at this a Bengali has sent me this letter of abuse" With this he handed me a letter written by somebody from Howrah containing severe abuse of the Maulana. I looked over the letter and told him that he had no reason to feel sorry for the writer was not after all his enemy seeing that he had addressed him as My very dear Mr Mahomed Ali. He laughed and said 'That is just where the Bengali excels.

When the Maulana was showing me this letter and complaining of its cootents. Jamnadas came in and asked him by way of a joke. What position would he like to fill when Swaraj was wou? He replied "I will open a small school and take to teaching little children. Io Maulana Sahib s opinion the delight of teaching little children was not comparable to that of teaching grown up students. Then, he went oo expressing some of his views on other aspects of education and then after a pause made the following statement — All this is what my heart yearns after. Bot if Swaraj comes shall I find leisure to gratify my personal tastes. Then there shall be no end of work before us for we shall have to build up the life of the nation.

At Gauhati I heard the Maolana Sahib say in the presence of many io Mahatmaji's room that, altough he was taken for a Hindu hater it would be found from a careful study of his writings that he had from the very first been preaching the ueed for Hindu Moslem unity. But he was also convinced that if the Mussaimans remained down and the Hindus continued to be the more powerful partner the unity could not last long. Therefore, he feit that there was need for the Mussaimans to be equally strong. And the good of Iodia would be truly secured said he only when friendship between Hindus and Mussaimans was established on this basis of equality.

Going out oo business on the morning of the 5th I found that no tram was running and that there was a complete strike of tramway men. Mahatmaji had returned to Calcutta the previous day, and people began to suspect that he might be at the bottom of it all, but as a matter of fact, he knew nothing about it. When having finished my business I returned and told him of the strike, he looked so surprised that I saw that he had not heard of it.

At this time my teacher received a letter from Professor Kripalani in which he asked my teacher's advice under the following circumstances. The Professor had gone home in Hyderabad (Sindh), as his lather was laid up with a severe illness. There was no lack of people, the Professor wrote, to nurse his father, but his father would not let him return to his non-co-operation work, as he did not approve of his turning a non-co-operator, and dedicating himself to national work. That was the situation in which he was placed, and the question was what he should do in the circumstances. My teacher forwarded the letter through me to Mahatmaji and wished to have his opinion, on the question.

On the morning of the 13th September Mahatmaji left Calcutta for Midnapore According to the programme after finishing his Assam and Bengal tour he must leave for Madras. By this time detailed reports of the Moplah* out break of Malabar began to pour in and it was felt that there was urgent need for him to repair to the scene and make an effort to stop the disorders and restore amity between Hindus and Moslems there. For the news came that the Moplah rebels in a mood of frenzy had been practising all sorts of oppression on the Hindus of the place The report of the Congress Committee on the outbreak had already reached Mahatman in Calcutta and he had taken the earliest opportunity of discussing it with Pandit Motilal Nehru Lala Lajpat Rai Deshabandhii Das and other distinguished leaders. Thus, there was the most urgent need of his leaving for Madras at once But a stay of a couple of days more in Calcutta was rendered necessary under following circumstances Rumours emanating from distinguished sources of the impending arrest of Maulana Mahomed Ali were coming in The news had arrived that a messenger from Bombay carrying a most important message was to arrive that very day in Calcutta Accordingly Maulana Sahib did not accompany Mahatmali to Midnapore Maulana Sahib might even postpone his visit to

Madras, if he thought it necessary on receipt of the Bombay message. In that case, Mahatmaji would not proceed further, but return to Calcutta. In the other alternative, Maulana Sahib was to take the evening Madras Mail and join Mahatmaji at Kharagpore. In this state of things, we could not be sure whether we were to proceed to Madras from Midnapore, or come back to Calcutta.

He took Prablindas and me with him to Midnapore Jamnadas was left behind in charge of our things, and if it was finally settled that Mahatmaji was to proceed to Madias, Jamnadas was to accompany Maulana Mahomed Ali by the Madias Mail, and join us at Kharagpore

Mahatmaji was being escorted by Deshabandu Das, Mr Jitendralal Banerji, Mrs Urmila Devi, and many others Mr Das was to bid good-bye to Mahatmaji at Midnapoie and proceed with his co-workers to Bankura and other places. In the train Mahatmaji wrote a long letter in Hindi addressed to Seth Jamnalal Bajaj at his Calcutta address which I posted at Kharagpore.

At Kharagpore the Khilafat volunteers presented a guard of honour to Mahatmaji. They were dressed like soldiers, putting on uniform, caps and boots and standing in military array. But with all this show of military dignity, they had forgotten properly to learn the primary duties of volunteers, namely, to keep order, and we who stood behind Mahatmaji were in imminent danger of suffocation under the pressure of the crowd. Mahatmaji was taken from Kharagpore to Midnapore by a special train. The profuse hospitality, and the sweet words and manners of the Midnapore people gave us an insight into their amiable character and extreme tender-heartedness. On the other hand it was clear to me that Midnapore people were inferior to the people of Eastern Bengal in their riganising capacity. At Midnapore I came to feel for the first time that the different districts of Bengal differed from one another in language in manners and customs much in the same manner as the provinces of India differed among them selves and then the thought struck me that if the people of each district would but duly appreciate the superior qualities of character of the people of other districts and tried to assumilate them in their own character, then there would be a rapid development of our national character.

On reaching our quarters at Midnapore I had no particular work to do except the usual routine ones At the time of his midday meal I found Maliatmaji engaged in talk with Deshabandhu Das on diverse topics. In reply to Deshabandhus query as to how he had arrived at his present convictions. Mahatman said that he had not derived them from the study of books He was not much given to reading in fact in his whole life he did not think he had read more than two hundred books. But there were certain books by which he had been much benefited. For instance Ruskin's Unite This Last which he had read for the first time in South Africa had opened out to his vision an altogether new world and had in fact made him an altogether new man Mr Jitendralal Banerii was there at that time Deeply read in English Literature he was listening to the talk with eager delight. As soon as Rushin s name was mentioned Mr Baneril pointed out that there was nothing in Ruskin's writings so far as he knew which taught non violence and he referred to some of Ruskin's works in that connection. He was therefore curlons to know whence Mahatmaji had got that doctrine Mahatmaji without making any definite reply went on saying that owing to his ignorance of Sanskrit, he had been unable to read the Gita in the original, yet he had much profited by the study of Sii Edwin Ainold's English version, The Song Celestial

As the sun was burning hot at Midnapore that day, I was much exercised to hear that Mahatmaji was to be taken round in procession through the town. I had now begun to pay greater attention to his comforts and conveniences and less to the satisfaction of the wishes and demands of the general public. So I went and told Mahatmaji of the proposed procession, and he at once exclaimed, "No procession, there should be no procession." But the local leaders began to press him and press him and made it impossible for him to decline their request. After the procession, he attended a meeting of ladies after which he come to the public meeting.

The meeting began with the presentation one after another of addresses by the municipality, the public and the local pleaders. Some locally made Khaddar clothes were then presented to him. At this point a Santal stood up from among the audience, and with the words—"We are poor, ignorant Santals, yet please accept these clothes of ours"—handed over to Mahatmaji a pair of beautiful Khaddar chudders, woven with their own hands. I had seen Mahatmaji at several places in Assam and Eastern Bengal accept such Khaddar gifts, but here he rose from his seat, and stretching out his hands received the gifts with a degree of eager satisfaction, which I had not noticed elsewhere. In reply to the addresses he addressed the lawyers first and said that though it was a great pleasure to him to describe himself as an agriculturist a weaver and a labourer he had formerly been a legal practitioner himself in a small way But when he resided that he could not serve his country as a lawyer he forthwith gave up the profession. He believed that the era of the supremacy of lawyers in public life had gone by and that the era of sacrifice and service had arrived They alone now could hope to attnin to the position of guides and leaders who with undaunted courage and spirit devote themselves whole heartedly to the work of the country. The days of appeals and petitions, and of convening meetings and passing resolutions—these days were gone. Therefore the sympathies of the masses could no longer be won by the application of mere ingenuity or by the display of eloquer ce No longer would it be possible to win the hearts of our countrymen except by the exhibit tion of superior sacrifice counge and heroism. That was why he had expressed the opinion that practising lawyers could not aspire to the position of leadership in the present movement Personally he had no feelings of ill will against lawyers. But having followed the trend of public feeling he had simply given expression to the country views in the matter He did not wish to keep his inwyer brothers out of the movement but would merely ask them to give up their position of leadership while serving the country For a whole period of thirty five years they had held the position of leadership let them now accept the position of lieutenants handing over their leadership into other hands and following their lead. In these days he who would enlist himself as a soldler in the ranks of the national army could expect to render real service to the coootry not a soldier to kill others, but to be killed himself while fighting wrong. The soldier who would not flinch an inch while fighting, and would rather be killed than kill his adversary, is indeed the greater hero. The nation's need now was to have as many such heroes, as possible as would learn to stand up for right while injuring none, and, if it so be, most cheerfully give up their lives on the scaffold. Hence it was that he advised his lawyer friends to keep themselves for a while in the background and enlist as soldiers in the ranks.

Then after exhorting his hearers to see that all the promised subscriptions to the Tilak Swaraj Fund of Bengal were soon collected, he concluded by saying that during that visit to Bengal, he had for his special object the preaching of Swadeshi, Non violence and Hindu-Muslim Unity He still held that Swarai would not take long to be established, if only they succeeded in keeping the peace in the country, and in fulfilling the programme of Swadeshi With regard to Hindu-Muslim Unity he wanted to dispel a doubt After the Moplah outbreak, it might be argued that Hindu-Muslim Unity was a dream He was of no such opinion He believed that even after Hindu-Muslim unity had been broadly achieved, such occasional outbursts were still possible Such unity would survive the shocks of occasional outbursts, if the wiser and better minds among both the Hindu and Muslim communities exercised their influence properly. Apart from the Moplah excesses, in Mahatmaji's opinion certain incidents that had happened at Calcutta on the 12th September were quite indefensible A certain Marwari trader on the refusal of an Oriya cooly to carry a bundle of foreign cloth, had so assaulted the latter that he became half-dead. The condoct of that Marwan gentleman was there was not the least doubt, most reprehensible oevertheless his own conviction was that if that Oriva brother and his sympathisers had calmly borne that wrong and not retaliated then the foreign cloth trade of Calcutta woold soon have come to a stop Bot it was a matter of the greatest repret to him to hear that a crowd, some twenty or at the least computation some ten thousand strong collected about that Marwari trader s shop, and were prepared to wreak vengence on him by assaulting him. By such excitement and acts of violence there was not the least chance of our being brought near to the goal. We must learn to keep our heads cool and put up with ill treatment without gett ing cowed down. It was only thus that we could acquire the necessary morale for launching on a campign of Civil Disobedience of peaceful revolt on a mass scale

ARREST OF MOULANA MAHOMED ALI

Leaving Midnapore, we reached Kharagpore at 8 in the evening, where we met Maulana Maliomed Ali, who had come by the Madras Mail, prepared to go to Madras Jamnadas had also come with Mahatmaji's luggage expected messenger from Bombay also came as far as Kharagpore, and delivered to Mahatmaji a letter for him from Maulana Shaukat Ali in which he wrote to say that he had had information of the impending arrest of himself as well Mahatmaji had a berth reserved for him as of his brother from Calcutta, which he now occupied, while, Prabhudas and I got in where we conveniently could Passing through the greater part of Orissa during the night, we found ourselves in the morning on the borders of Orissa and the Andhra country We were much impressed with the hospitality of the people here. For when they heard that Mahatman would be passing that way to Madras, they had on their own initiative made ample provision for Mahatmaji's comforts

Reaching Waltair station at 2 30 PM we found one half of the platform completely occupied and guarded by a body of soldiers. With their military pomp and display, they looked stern and grim, and cowed the people around into utter silence. Seeing this military array, we thought that something extraordinary was going to happen. But the train slowly passed the line of soldiers, and stopped where the platform was free. There the passengers got down and I too got down and went to see Mahatmaji. Then the Secretary of the local Congress Committee came with some friends to request Mahatmajl and Maulana Mahomed Ali to come and briefly address the people gathered outside All this while the armed soldiers merely stood still and the train itself remained on the further side of the platform away from the troops. This led me to think that these preparations might after all have nothing to do with the Maulana Saheh Both Mahatmaji and the Maulana Saheb got down from the train in response to the Congress Secretary's request and proceeded outside. Some four or five seconds after this the train was moved back to that side of the platform which was guarded by the troops and I noticed that the European Officer in charge of the force with four or five of his men hurried away outside the station in breathless haste. Some two or three minutes after the other soldiers also formed themselves into a line and quickly marched out of sight

All this happened before my own eyes What took place outside the station I shall relate as I heard it from Mahatman's own lips. He and Maulana Saheh were walking to the meeting he before and the Maulana behind when two Enropeans with a few soldiers came from behind and arrested the Maulana. Mahatmaji did not stop. For there was a big crowd assembled and Mahatmaji apprehending that If they got excited they might get ont of control and there might be bloodshed thought of leading the crowd away from the spot and the crowd followed him as he moved away. Thus when Maulana Saheb got arrested Mahatmaji could not exchange a word with him. Proceeding to the place of meeting he gave the audience a few words of exhortation saying that they were required to keep calm and strictly to carry out the instructions of the Congress. Then he returned to where the Maulana Saheb was kept in custody, and asked the officer in charge, if he could have permission to speak to the Maulana. The officer said that the order was that only his wife and his secretary might for a few minutes be permitted to see him. Then, Mahatmaji said with a smile, 'I become his private secretary, if you have no objection.' The officer smilingly answered that he had no option in the matter.

Mr Hayat, Maulana Saheb's secretary, was standing by at the time, and when he heard that he and the Beguam Saheba would be permitted to see him, he ran in breathiess haste to the Begum Saheba's compartment and escorted her to the spot A few minutes after Mahatmaji was seen returning with the Begum Saheba and Mr Hayat on eitherside of him, eagerly followed by a sad and silent multitude The Begum Saheba was walking with proud, rapid steps When Mahatmaji asked her, "Are you feeling nervous?", she replied, 'Oh, no'' Mahatmaji returned to his compartment, and Mr Hayat went to escort the Begum Saheba to hers, but soon returning he informed Mahatmaji that she had spoken to her husband in terms of high encouragement telling him that on no account must he worry about her Mr Hayat reported also that the Maulana Saheb had enjoined him to kiss Mahatmaji's hand in his name, and kneeling down, Mr Hayat took the hand of Mahatmaji and kissed it with exuberance of emotion An old maidservant of the Begum Saheba was travelling in our compartment. When I once had occasion to go there, in most anxious tones she asked 'What's the matter what's the matter? and then fell to weeping. It seemed to us as If within the twinkling of an eye some great unforeseen calamity had overtaken us. But as a matter of fact, there was no room for any surprise in the matter for the Maolana Saheh s arrest had been talked about for a pretty long time. But the way in which the arrest was carried oot, the pomp of milit ary display and the abruptness and secrecy observed made the whole transaction in pire awe. It was as if a tiger had been stealthily pursuing its victim and had anddenly fallen nooo him from the rear. When one near and dear to a man is spirited away to a manner like this the very suddenness of the occurrence awas and stuns much like this was the state of our feelings at the sudden deappearance of Mahomed Alt from our view On one side of the station was a small room where Manlana Saheb was kept confined. There it seemed to me that his land bursts of laughter his frank straightforward talks, an I his tall tranquil figure were all equally undergoing confinement. If only he had been granted a minnte or two to hid good hye to his friends and associates, the arrest would not have appeared to them as anything hut a merry episode and not the cruel blow that it was felt to be by reason of the ahruptness and mysteriousness of the whole transaction

The Maolana Saheb's servant stayed behind at Waltar with a few of his things. Mahatmaji i ostructed the local Coogress Secretary to keep himself i formed as to where Maulana Saheh was taken and to send to Madras any information he could obtain. Then without losing a moment be drafted a loog telegram in peoci and handed it to us for despatch to all the principal papers. We copied out the telegram and took it to the Telegraph office at the next station, but were told that under Government orders no telegrams could be despatched for full twenty-four hours, and that therefore our telegram could be sent after the lapse of 24 hours. After a brief recital of the news of Maulana Saheb's arrest the telegram proceeded to say —

"There is no cause for sorrow, but every cause for congratulation. There should be no hartal. Perfect peace and calm should be observed. I regard the arrest as a prelude to Swaraj and the redress of Khilafat and the Punjab wrongs, if we can remain non-violent, retain Hindu-Muslim unity, despite the madness of some Moplahs, and fulfil the Swadeshi programme

"I hope every Indian, man or woman, will completely boycott foreign cloth, and take up spinning or weaving during every spare minute

"By striving like the Moulana, be insistent on religious and national rights

"Let us earn imprisonment I am conscious of the Moulana's innocence, and I am sure the imprisonment of the innocent will enable the nation to reach the cherished goal

"The Moulana was quite caim So is the Begum Saheba She accompanies me during the travel So does Moulana Azad Sobhani"

Several other telegrams were also despatched in different directions. Then, after asking me to take a copy of the warrant of ariest, Mahatmaji proceeded to write the article which was published in the Young India of the 22nd September under the title of "The Last Act?" In spite of the stoppage of telegraphic communications for twenty four hours, we found the people at every station putting to us the same question in eager and excited tones, 'How is Mahomed Ali?' Where is Mahomed Ali? Thus misfortune cast its shadow on loving hearts by the mere power of sympathy

At every place on the way Mahatmaji gave the news of the arrest and then in brief words exborted the people to preserve calm. He told those that were not wearing Khaddar that they must surrender their foreign cloth even if they had to be content with the merest loin-cloth to cover their nakedness. He comforted them with the assorance that if they kept the peace and carried out his instructions they woold soon succeed in winning Swara; and liberate the Ali Brothers for he suspected the arrest of Manlana Shankat Ali at Bombay that very day The turn of Deshabandhu Das would come next that of Lala Laput Rai would follow and if notwithstanding all these provocations the people were able to remain calm and there were no breaches of the peace then his arrest would follow at the very end. At a certain station on the way two former students of the Aligarh College came to meet Valuatmaji they said that the Maulana Saheb was their teacher and that they were feeling like orphans in his absence Mahatmaji looking steadily to the ground said :- Never mind We will soon get bim back free. The sky having been overcast we had no idea that the sun had gone down and so when Prabhu das lighted the stove and prepared to boil the milk for Mahatman he reminded Prabhudas that the sun had already set and that he would have no food that evening

MADRAS-I

Passing through the Andhra country in the night, we noticed at every station on the platform unnumbered people waiting with torchlights in their hands to offer welcome to Wherever the train stopped, two or three of Mahatman the local leaders would come and exchange a few words with Mahatmaji, and then report the substance of Mahatmaji's message to the assembled multitude in a ringing voice so as to be heard by all After which the leaders whirling their hands round over their heads would raise joyous shouts, and the multitude would in chorus cry "Victory to Mahatma Gandhi" Thus it happened that the incessant noise of the moving train followed by the din of the roaring multitude would almost dealen our ears In the evening we were joined by the distinguished Andhra leader, Deshabhakta Konda Venkatappayya, who drew our hearts by his calm, gentle and dignified figure, and his perfect humility so natural to him The whole of the night was passed in this fashion, and when the morning dawned we were nearing At Basin Bridge the station next before the Madras Central Station, the distinguished leaders of Madras met us, and escorted Mahatmaji, Begum Mahomed Ali, and Maulana Azad Sobhani, in a special train to Madras the passengers should be put to great inconvenience by the crowd at the Madras Station, the main train was detained for some length of time at the Basin Bridge Station until after Mahatmaji had left by the special train Mr Hayat, Jamnadas and myself remained in the Mail train to charge of oor things while Prabhadas accompanied Mahatmaji Reaching the Central Station later we found that all the crowd had left with Mahatmaji Begum Mahomed All Saheba being the guest of the local Khilafat Committee, Mr Hayat went there while Jamnadas and I sought the hospitality of a Guzarati merchant called Ramji Kalyaoji at Suilivan's Road San Thome where Mahatmaji had al ready preceded ns

We had left Calcutta on the morning of the 13th September and reached Madras on the morning of the 15th Mr Ramji kalyanji s mansion was boilt after the old Hindu style of architectore there were no arches over the doors large graoute slabs acted as supports. The rooms also mostly looked like what I had seen in pictorial illustrations of old Hindo architectore. This showed that the traditions of Hindu architectore were not dead in Madras. Bot modernism also came in to redress the balance of the old. For we noticed that up to date devices of modern applied science had been laid inder requisition as it to prophilate the spirit of the Modern Age.

When we reached oor quarters, the first thing that met my eyes was Mahatmail's belog interviewed oo the political situati in by a Eoropean representative of the Anglo-Indian paper Madras Mail. No sooner did this gentleman leave than another gentleman with a prepossessing smile oo his face entered. He was the representative of another paper the local Daily Express. The eagerness of the papers for news reflected the excitement in the city over the arrest of Maulana Mahomed Ali. Arriving in Madras we received information that Maulana Shaukat Ali, Dr Kitchlew, and the other co accused in the Karachi trial had been arrested also about the same time. The one question on every body's lips was "what must we do now? What is Mahatman's order for us now?" The reporter of the daily Hindu came and took down a detailed report of Mahomed Ali Saheb's arrest from Jamnadas The representative of the Daily Express came a second time with an English artist, and went away with sketches of Mahatman, while he was engaged in writing, and so on. The spinning wheel in Mahatman's room was a special attraction for the artist, who turning round and round viewed from different angles and made sketches of it. But when these sketches appeared in print, they made a poor show Mahatmaji had lost some of the front teeth, the reporters were careful to take note of the fact! However, on the whole it struck me that the way in which the Madras newspapers were conducted was creditable, so much so that journalism in Bengal seemed to be half a century behind in comparison

According to the Congress system of classification, the province known politically as the Presidency of Madras is split up into three separate provinces, the two chief being the Andhra Desha (the country of the Andhras) in the north, and Tamil Nadu (the Tamil country) in the South, with Kerala (modern Malabar) as the third. The vernacular of Andhra Desha is Telugu, while that of Tamil Nadu is Tamil. I saw the leaders of both these provinces seated in conference with Mahatmaji, but none of the leaders of Malabar could come. Those were the days of the Moplah outbreak in Malabar, and they were too busy in connection therewith Forther Martial law having been proclaimed in that country egress and ingress had become a difficult matter. One mason for law Madras visit was the desire of Mahatman and Mahomed Ali to proceed to Malabar and restore peace there but the Maulana Salieb lind been arrested on the way and now at Madras Maliatinau also received an intimation from the Government which forbade his entrance into Majabar. This letter was at once forwarded by Mahatmaji to the Hindy for publication People about us were saying that the Chief Secretary to the Madras Government was the Alrian rules of the Province, and that he was not the man to misk the excellent opportunity offered by the Moplah rebellion to crush the spirit of the people conving the example of Mesers O Dayer and Thompson to the Puniab As far as I could make out the popular belief at Madras was that the policy belund the prohibition was to make sure that the opportunity in question was not lost by Mahatmaji s soccess in restoring peace in Malabar

On reaching Madras we began to realise that the problems of the country were getting too complicated every day and that Mahatmajl alooe of all people had the moral strength and the cajacity to steer the course of events in the face of this growing complication. It was not possible for us, his followers to keep our heads cool and judge of events to their rapid succession in their true perspective. Our position was more like soldiers on the march in the battle field who have no time to look behind nor to retrace steps even if they wished. The present with its multi-udinous array of events would so obsess our intelligence and understanding that it was not possible for os either to look into the past, or to look forward into the future. It was altogether a new kind of life with which I was confronted, but even to this I was gradually getting subdued

In Bengal, Mahatman had chiefly concerned himself with the question of Swadeshi or Khaddar, but in Madras, it seemed to me that the Khaddar movement was in an even more unsatisfactory plight Besides, there was the problem of untouchability for which Madras had earned an unenviable Mahatman had made up his mind that the programme of Swadeshi should have to be completed by the end of September. But my feeling at the time was that collection of a crore of rupees for the Tilak Swarai Fund was a comparatively easy affair, seeing that the spirit of Swadeshi was not finding a lodgement in the hearts of the people with the same ease Wherever Mahatman came. there was nothing wanting in the matter of enthusiasm and excitement, and of cheers for Mahatman But the problem which set me athinking at the time was, "When and how would it be possible to effect that change of heart among the entire body of our people, which would make them take Khaddar as to a vow?" For it was clear that if the Swadeshi made only a superficial mark on their minds, and did not transform their character, there was no likelihood of the Khaddar movement leaving any abiding results

The people of the Andhra country were now much exercised over a "Grazing tax' which the Government had imposed upon them. As people were unable to pay this tax, the cattle of whole villages were taken away and impounded. Neither were the cows properly fed, and they were kept apart from their calves, which of course was a great misery to the latter. This state of things had given rise to much excitement among the masses.

there and the leaders had come to seek Mahatmajl s per

Then there was another question on which Mahatmaji was called upon to decide The Hindus of Malabar were suffering extreme mental torture because of a number of forced conversions of Hindos at the hands of the Moplah rebels. Some of the Malabar Hindus had come to lay their case before Mahatmaji They were beside themselves with anger and grief The Monlahs could never be forgiven for what they had done and onity between them and the Hindus was unthinkable -this was the hurden of their statements. Mahatmaji spoke sweetly to them to soothe their grieved spirits but he told them at the same time that if they abandoned themselves to those feelings Hindu Moslem unity would remain an unsolved problem. There was not the slightest doubt that the conduct of the Moplalis had been most repreheo able nevertbeless Mahatmah would advise them to bear with dignity the pain which had been gnawing at their hearts. Not only so but he also considered it their duty to take upon themselves the task of so training the Monlahs that they might in foture behave like decent peace-loving people

Then there was the anti-Brahmin movement of the Soothern Presidency to which Mahatmaji's attention was bere called A printed circular letter issued by the oon Brahmios was now put loto his hands. He showed It to some of the distinguished people of the city and he called it a most amazing document. Down with the Brahmins's such was the title given to it and its language was such as to make one feel that if the Hindus did not take time by the forclock and set about solving the non Brahmin problem, then fierce revolutionary intercaste hostilities would break out in South India at no distant date Mahatmaji diew the attention of the principal men, who had come to see him, to the seriousness of the question with a view to have the evil removed

Since he had been in Madras, Mahatmaji had become the central figure to whom all political parties in the city, except that of Mrs. Besant, turned for guidance and counsel. Besides the arrest of the Ali Brothers had added to his responsibility and his attention to work was now, if possible, more whole-hearted

On the morning of the 16th came Mr. Hayat to inform us that the Maulana Saheb's servant had come back with the news that the Maulana Salieb, after being kept confired in the Vizagapatam jail for a night, had been taken northwards by a special train. From this we interred that he was then being taken to Kaiachi. Then Mr Hayat in mournful tones recited that in the Vizag jail, the Maulana Salieb had been given only bread and milk for the night which he declined to partake of, and that as a consequence he had to fast the Mahatmaji had for the time taken to silence whole night just to get through some urgent piece of work, but hearing what Mr Hayat said, he could no longer restrain himself but with shakes of his head burst out laughing. Bread and milk was, of course, Mahatman's usual fare, but could such powerfully built frames like those of the Ali Brothers sustain themselves on such lare? The Government apparently thought that since Mahatmaji, prince among non-co-operators, could support himself on mere bread and milk, every other non co-operator could similarly live on a course of bread and milk diet!

MADRAS-II

At Madras Mahatmaji addressed a monster meeting oo the beach on the evening of the 15th. Large numbers were eagerly waiting to hear him as it was his first public ntterance after the orrest of the All Brothers. Mahatmali began by exhorting his hearers not to indulge in cheering or in cries of Shame Shame as by mere condemostion of the acts of Government, we could not advance our cause in the least. If we really wanted to do something we would go about to work with greater determination than ever The time before us was so limited and the programme before us was so big and therefore it was a problem how best we should set about our business so as to be able to finish it within the prescribed period. But we had reason to be thankful that God was with us and was working oo our side, and so he called upon all to cherish the faith that although we were so weak, and wanting in competence just at present, we might if God so willed it so develop our strength as to be able to wrest success in no time.

Referring to the arrest of the Ali Brothers Mahatmaji said that he looked upon it as a blessing from on high. The Brothers true heroes as they were had porsued the nath of Truth and Righteousness with all their strength. Maulaoa Mahomed Ali had been proceeding to Malabar with the landable object of restoring peace and order there and vet be was arrested on the way sod the Viceroy had to instily 12

his conduct From the day on which the Maulana Saheb proclaimed his acceptance of the policy of non-violence, he had been constantly with him, and Mahatmaji could bear witness to the fact that he had not deviated by a hair's breadth from his promise of non-violence To all who had sought his advice, whether in public or in private, the Maulana Saheb had consistently maintained the need for nonviolence And yet the Ali Brothers were no cowards would be a great mistake to suppose that because of their promise and acceptance of non-violence, they had sacrificed their right of free speech, that is to say, of giving indepen-He had not come across dent expression to their views men who combined in their own character greater bravery and sincerity than the Ali Brothers. If they had used harsh words on occasions they had done so in obedience to the dictates of Truth, and Mahatmajı fully believed that no other Mussalman had worked for peace in India in the way in which the Ali Brothers had done. He held, therefore, that in imprisoning the Brothers the Government had really imprisoned the Khilafat

Then referring to the general policy of repression inaugurated in the country, to the reign of oppression in Malabar following on the Moplah rebellion, as also to the insult offered to many people there by the forcible removal of Khaddar caps and shirts from their bodies, and referring also to the campaign of putting the masses of the Andhra country to great harassment by the systematic seizure of their cattle, Mahatmaji declared that the only way to free ourselves from such acts of tyranny would be to go on vigorously prosecuting the present agitation strictly on the lines of non-violence. If, indeed, we must preserve our national self repect so as to compel the Government to con cede the national demands, and if we must set free Maulana Mahomed Alı and the other devoted servants of the country who had been unwarrantably cast into prison, then the only way left to us would be to put our whole soul into the work of winning Swaraj

But how was this Swaraj to be won. Mahatmaji an swered that for himself he could prescribe nothing better than the practice of non violence the preservation of Hindu-Moslem muty and the adoption of Khaddar It was his belief that the more the spirit of non violence permeated the country the more the spirit of Hindu-Moslem unity could grow Then he pointed out that one sure sign of the growth of the non violent spirit and of Hindu Moslem unity in the country would be the wider and wider adoption of Khaddar by the people at large. He said that his heart burned within him to note the abundance of foreign cloth on the persons of his hear ers; and then pointing to the example presented by Begum Mahomed Alı Saheba as well as by the Ali Brothers, in the matter of their dress Mahatmail exhorted them well all men and women to follow their example giving up their foreign clothing and taking to the use of Klinddar

Mahatmaji went on emphasising the point by saying that there might be people who might object to or for want of necessary stamina, fail to carry ont some of the other items of non-co-operation but with regard to Swadeshi there could be or ought to be, no two opinions. Swadeshi was the dkarma of every Indian from the highest to the lowest. As our fight was a religious fight, therefore there could be God willing no sort of distinction of high and low in our army and hence the right of using Khaddar and through Khaddai acquiring the right of forming an integral part of the national army, belonged to everyone, rich or poor, old or young, healthy or sick, touchable or untouchable.

Mahatman then proceeded to give out his whole heart about the Charkha It is simply impossible for him to keep under control the intense feelings of delight he feels when expatiating on the virtues of the spinning wheel see, he said, the Goddess of India's fortune seafed in the The Charkha would cure us of our national charkha lethargy and give us strength, and the confident assurance of final success It gave the surest indication of how far the spirit of non-violence had permeated the country the best means of bringing about unity among the different races in India, not merely Hindu-Moslem unity, but the bond of indissoluble amity among all the diverse races inhabiting the Indian continent. The Charkha should be regarded as the best safeguard and emblem of the chastity of women, for Mahatman said that he could bear witness to the fact that for the want of the Charkha many an unfortunate woman had for a mere pittance to sell her viitue Charka would become the widow's constant companion It had been formerly the one support of the poor rayat during several months of the year and who should tell what vast numbers might not have owed the strength and the purity of their lives to the Charka Only when the spinning wheel went on working regularly in every home in India could it be possible to know for certain that we had ceased to hold bodily labour in contempt, that is, as something inferior to intellectual labour. The charka would be the comforter of the untouchables, and the only means of salvation for the fallen women of the land. And lastly declared Mahatmaji only when the charkha had found a permanent place in our homes and become an integral part of our daily lives, should it be time to launch mass civil disobedience to help the country out of its fallen coudition. Disobedience of the law under the inflience of anger or excitement, could never be civil disobedience. It would be criminal. And if it was our aim said Mahatmaji to work with a view to win Swaraj within this very year, then it was necessary to spread far and wide through every part of the country the forces of peace and nou violence, and if so he knew of no other in strument than the spinning wheel which could help us to bring about the necessary purification on a nation wide scale.

Mahatmaji conclinded his speech by again exhorting his hearers not to indrige in any kind of cries noise or demon stration at public meetings. For from long experience he had learnt that such demoustrations heated the blood and gave rise to anger which it its turn led to violence. Hence if they should learn to be non-violent and work in a calm dispassionate and organised manner they should avoid all excitement. He also warned them that the mouths before them would be months of imprisonment and suffering for the workers. The darkest honr of the tight was before the dawn but that darkness was the herald of the dawn. He therefore called upon all to see with the eyes of faith and behold the faith streaks of the coming morn piercing through the dense darkness which was then enveloping the country.

"SILENCE!" "SILENCE"!

We left Madras city on the morning of the 17th, September, and speeded south in the direction of Rameswaram. After touring the Tamil Nadu, Mahatmaji was to visit certain districts of the Andhra country on the northen route to Bombay. The programme of his tour in the Andhra districts had been already settled, but there was some delay in fixing the Tamil Nadu programme. So, for the present, he decided to go to Trichinopoly, after visiting Porto Novo, Cuddalore and Kumbhakonam

Leaving our place, while it was still dark, we reached the Egmore station (Madras), when it was about day break to take the Rameswaram Express It was a metre gauge section of the South Indian Railway, the carriages were of small size, but there was the convenience of a long corridor leading from one extremity of the train to the other soon as the train drew up along the platform, we hurriedly got in with all our luggage. There was no great crowd at One thing I noticed throughout our tour in the South was that volunteers were much less in evidence there than elsewhere Reaching the Villupuram station at 10 or 11, we found the crowd forming in such a solid mass that, in the expressive Bengali phrase, not even a mustard seed if let fall could find its way to the ground There being no volunteers to regulate the crowd, everybody was trying to calm and restrain his fellows and this only gave rise to a greater confusion and upmar. Some were pressing down those in front by their shoulders and calling upon them to at down listily crying "Olda rungo! Old. rungo, n.e., at down sit down while others were trying to silence them with shouts of Sattam podadey softam-podadey i e-"silence silence! which only added to the volume of the noise. While this terrible uproar and confusion was in full swing. Mahatmaji get flown for a while and soon returned with a harful of rupces for the Tilal Swaraj Fund But for us getting down was simply unthinkable. If we got down there was no hope of our coming linek to our places, for the pushing and jostling was so great that we were bound to drift far far away So we sat ught in our own places. In the meanwhile a batch of some ten or twenty would make their way perspiring through the crowd and gare at us through the undow of our carriage. They had soon to retire being forced to leave under pressure from behind and would be presently succeeded by another batch of some ten or twenty and so on till the train left the station. There was an air of quickness in the speech, the actions and the general movements of the Tamil people, which I had not particularly noticed among the peoples of other provinces I had so far come across

Reaching Porto Novo at 1-301.M we were the guests of a Dutch lady by name Mrss Peterson who lived at a great distance from the station. Though a foreigner and Christian she was dressed in San like all Indian women, and walked barefoot like them. She had also learnt to speak Tamil. We saw a good number of spinning, wheels in her house, she had to give lessons in spinning to Indian ladies of the place, and I could easily guess that she held.

Mahatmaji in high esteem She had built a school, and slie had resolved to get it opened by Mahatmaji. There were with her at the time two other European ladies, who had come to assist her in her work of hospitality. They were, however, dressed in European costume, but the way in which they ministered to our comforts left nothing to be desired.

After performing the opening ceremony of Miss Peterson's school, Mahatmaji was to motor to Cuddalore, a distance of some twenty miles, to address a meeting there As there was not much time, Mahatmaji was urged to make But no sooner had he arrived at Porto Novo than a number of Christian ladies and gentlemen engaged him in a religious talk with them, and he entered into a heart to heart talk with them, as though he was a brother in faith. He informed them that in South Africa his most intimate friends were mostly Christians, and then he began to tell his reminiscences in connection with them had also come in his own life when he was faced with the question of embracing Christianity, but God had ordained otherwise On this an Indian Christian lady said that they had still hopes of his conversion, as it was their faith that there was no hope of salvation for any one who did not accept Christianity Christ alone was the Prince of Peace, and nobody else could give peace. At this Mahatmaji shook his head and smiled, and said "That, of course, is your faith, but so exactly is the belief of Hindus that Hinduism alone could give salvation, and the Mussalmans also similarly believe the same in respect of their own religion." Then alluding to a certain famous Christian Missionary, he went on to say,—"When I first met him inSonth Africa, the first question he pnt to me was you got peace? to which I replied Yes, I have He was surprised and asked me how not being a Christian I could have found peace Then after a pause Mabatmaji contioued

Truth to say if only we could get at and understand the fundamentals of all the different religions, all the ill feeling and jealousy that they have given rise to are bonod to disappear. For all the different practices and observances prescribed by different denominations have for their oltimate objective the porification of man. Nevertheless my conviction is that Hinduism is the most scientific of religions and therefore it is that I hug. Hinduism to my bosom. In this I may oot be accused of bigotry for I have steered my course after scrutinising and examining everything. Among the Christian audience was a geotleman who appeared to me to be a Bengali from his general appearance and his flowing beard but I was soon disillusioned for as soon as Mahatmaji had left for his bath, he began to sing aloud a Tamil song

After visiting Miss Peterson's school Mahatmaji left for the Cnddalore meeting. I stayed behiod with Prabhndas and Anwaruddin the popil and follower of Manlana Azad Sobhani. Poor Anwar unable to understand Tamil or to make bimself understood through his Urdu was now put to such trouble that he began to express his regret that the Maulana Saheb should have brought him to such a place as the Tamil country. As soon as Mahatmaji bad left for Cuddalore all the noise and the hubbob ceased. There is nothing specially worth seeing at Porto Novo but its name carries with it some historical associations. The town first founded by the Portuguese in the 16th century passed.

subsequently into the hands of European powers one after another, who succeeded in establishing for the time political ascendancy for itself in the south, finally coming into the possession of the English. Here at Porto Novo a fierce fight had been fought by the English with Hyder Ali, the famous Prince of Mysore. It is the view of some historians that, if the English had been beaten in this fight, it would not have been possible for the English to establish their domination over South India. The river Vellar flows by a side of the town, falling into sea near by. Some of the houses here belong to rich Arab traders, who have survived here as relics of a by-gone Arab supremacy on the Indian Ocean, which had lasted for many a long century until it was finally superseded by European domination on the Indian seas.

It was one O' clock at night when Mahatmajı returned from Cuddalore, and at 6-30 in the morning we had to leave, bag and baggage, for Kumbakonam Reaching the station, we found that the particular train we had intended to take was a Parcels Train, which carried no passengers at all The station officials, however, were good enough to empty a carriage for us, and so we were enabled to reach Kumbakonam at 11 O' clock Here is a big tank, called the "Mahamakham Tank" into which the Ganges is believed to flow once in twelve years, when hundreds of thousands of people earn the merit of a bath in the Ganges by a dip in its waters But, I who had come from the banks of the great Ganges at Benares, could hardly be expected to enter with any feeling into the greatness of a body of waters which had only a reflected glory. That very day at 5 P M we were to leave Kumbakonam again Immediately after arriving here,

Mahatmaji took to silence which lasted till 2 P.M after which he left for a meeting of the local weavers. His advice to them was that they must make up their miods to renounce drink ing and the weaving of foreign yarns' that they must weave Khaddar and nothing but Khaddar Then he came to the public meeting. But what sort of o meeting was this? In spite of my being by Mahatmaji's side I found myself too weak to elbow my way to the meeting place. The noise and rush not abating even when Mahatmail had begun to speak, he could not proceed Then Maolana Azad Sobham tried his best to get the crowd under control but all in vain For each one among the hearers felt it his doty to call upon everybody else to keep the peace. The cry of Shattam podadey Shattam podadey (Silence silencel) was on everybody's lips and so there was a horrible din instead of a calm Mahatmaji and the Maulana Saheb then left the meeting to catch the train at 5 P M

TRICHINOPOLY—I

Leaving Kumbakonam on the 18th September, we Trichinopoly at 8 P M It being reached Mahatmaji had to take his vow of silence after sunset previous Sundays, I had seen him beginning silence at But that evening he was chatting with us in the train, and it was already past seven I feared that through madvertance he might be breaking his rule, and so I teminded him that it was past seven, when his silence was to He smiled a little at my anxiety for the strict observance of his rule, and stopping short in the middle of his talk, took up silence rather abruptly On subsequent Sundays however, I found that he observed no particular rule as to the silence beginning punctually at seven in the evening It was enough if it began at some hour in the early part of Sunday night, and continued up till the corresponding hour on monday night For the first time in the course of many days I had that day seen him chatting with us freely, and it pains me to think, that on account of my inexperience, I stood in the way of his much needed relaxation

At Trichinopoly, we were agreeably surprised to note that although there was an immense gathering on the station platform, everybody respected Mahatmaji's vow of silence, and there was consequently no uproar. Thus he was able to get down from the train quite peacefully, and he was also peacefully taken to his appointed quarters. The order and calm which we witnessed here came as a balm to our nerves exhausted by the terrible confusion caused by the crowds during the last two days. We were the guests of Dr Rajan Congress Provincial Secretary at his bome near the station Dr Rajan s home had then become almost an Ashram. He informed Mahatmaji that he had made it a rule in his bome that no cloth should be bought for any member but that every one was to spin the yarn required for his or her clothing. Dr Rajan s house was situated in the midst of a large garden far from the din and bustle of the town and to us it seemed that after buffeting stormy weather we had reached a haven of peace where we might enjoy some rest and respite for some time.

The next day being Monday except for some special need no one was to be permitted to approach Mahatmaji. Most of the time I sat near him keeping guard. He looked much wearied. The night previous after retiring he had to get Prabhndas to shampoo his legs for a pretty long time. That noon also he felt the need of such shampooing and he wrote down for me. My legs require oiling and shampooing. This was the first occasion for me to touch his body and when I was engaged in shampooing he softly closed his eyes and fell into a short nap.

Often during the last two days I had noticed Mahatmaji intently studying a booklet on the unemployment problem in connection with the middle classes of India. The anthor believed that in his book he had devoted himself to the task of developing in a practical manner the economic ideals on which Mahatmaji's movement was based. As I was already conversant in part with the author's views, I availed myself of my leisure to write down a short criticism, explaining wherein Mahatmaji's views and ideals differed from the author's This I placed before Mahatmaji for his perusal He looked over my paper and wrote down on it a few words While approving of my criticism of the author's views, he disagreed with my contention that the unemployment question in India was but a part of the general unemployment problem agitating the present capitalist world and was but a manifestation of the self-same disease Marking passages where I had explained this view, he wrote against it on the margin, "Is that so?" the first blush I could not follow his criticism, but subsequent reflection convinced me that he was right, and I was wrong Unemployment in India with all its attendent starvation and suffering, I then saw, was the result of the exploitation of our wealth by Western Industrialism, while unemployment in Western countries was the result of the inequitable distribution of the wealth produced by hard worked labour This distinction had escaped me for the time being What had primarily engrossed my thoughts was the undoubted fact that under the influence of capitalism, our village communal life had been broken up, and our people had been forced to leave their homes and go abroad in search of means of subsistence To my mind the future of the country was thus most gloomy, and I pictured to myself the grim spectre of destruction slowly rearing its head and overtaking the whole country In Europe also, the same thing had taken place a century ago, with the destruction of village life in the wake of the introduction of machinery And comparing this with India's present state of things, I had contented myself with making Capitalism responsible for it. It was Mahatmaji's query that set me athinking and made me realise that the root cause of India's misery was the heartless exploitation of the masses of India by the force of Western Capitalism. I had concloded my note with the following — In Iodia we do not require to build no any new basis but only to revive by brining life blood foto the dying or decaying parts of the social politic. Therefore the mere insistance by the author on the need for the use of the hand or manual labour for productive purposes does not prove that his plan of work is identical with the plan of resuscitation aimed at by the movement of non-co-opera tion. Mahatmaji had nothing to say against this part of my criticism and I inferred that he was in agreement with me.

By this time the papers had announced that the Ali Brothers had been taken to Karachi for trial on the charge of spreading disaffection among Indian troops. On the day of our stay at Trichinopoly, Mr. Hayat, Maulana Mohamed Ali s secretary came to see Mahatmaji and returned to Madras in the evening spending the whole of the day in copying out the relevant portions of Mahatmaji s lengthy correspondence with the Viceroy Lord Reading in the matter of the 'Statement issued by the Ali Brothers.*

Mahatmaji was to motor to a place called the Chettinad

[&]quot;This "statement" by the All Brothers issued shortly after Lord Readings arrival in India as Viceroy is one of the outstanding indiants connected with the non-co-operation movement. The Viceroy's diplomatic cuming shone no where better than in the manner in which he handled the matter. The subject is discussed at full length in a future chapter under the Caption—"Diplomatic Cunning of the Government.

the next day Part of the route to Chettinad lay through the Indian State of Pudukottah On receipt of intimation that Mahatmaji would be going that way, the Pudukottah Durbar sent a letter to him intimating that his entiance into the State was prohibited Though this road lay within the boundaries of Pudukottah, it had all along been freely used by people, nor had the Duibar ever exercised its right of jurisdiction over it. The issue of this unexpected order, therefore, was generally believed to have been the work of the British Resident of the State Dr Swaminatha Sastry, secretary of the local Congress Committee, said with a laugh that the State of Pudukottah could be covered by a simple jump, suiting his action to the work. However, when the letter in question was placed before Mahatmaji, he wrote down a respectful reply telling the Durbar that he had cancelled his journey to Chettinad through the route in question

Mahatmaji's silence was broken at nightfall, and we made ready to go to the public meeting. The public of Trichinopoly gave him a warm and splendid reception the like of which we had not witnessed before. The route from his residence to the place of the public meeting was adorned at short intervals of distance with ornamental arches and various other decorations while at the meeting itself order and peace and organisation were in such striking evidence that Mahatmaji felt immensely pleased at the sight.

TRICHINOPOLY-II

The proceedings of the meeting began with the presen tation of an address by the local Moolcipality and Congress Committee Mahatmali's followed oext. He began by re ferring to the communique issued by the Bombay Govern ment to which it declared that the arrest of the Ali Brothers was due to their having attempted to tamper with the lovalty of the Indian troops In the communique it was explained why the Government had thought that the Brothers were guilty of having committed the offence. The communione referred to a Resolution passed at a Khilafat Conference held at Karachi which had the support of the Ali Brothers. That Resolution declared it haram or sinful for a Mussalman to zerve in the army under the present government. man declared that, if he had been present at the Karachi Conference he too would have supported that Resolution For although his Mussalman brothers alone were competent to decide what was in accordance with their religioo and what was against it, yet oo behalf of the Hindus and of ladians in geoeral he would say that under the existing conditions, it was haram for any Indian to work under the Government whether in the army or io any other depart ment And if it was an offence to say so openly or even in the presence of soldiers he himself had been guilty of that offence times without number It was nothing oew For be had deliberately with a full knowledge of the coase quences committed it at the Calcutta Special Coogress of September 1920 Then he had repeated it at the Nagpur Congress of December 1920, and if he, or the representatives of the Congress, had not so far been able to go and declare the message of the Congress to soldiers or other Government servants individually, it was certainly due not to want of will, but to want of ability to support them this unhappy land of ours, millions had to live staiving from year's end to year's end. The task of shouldering the responsibility of supporting all Government servants, who would leave their service would thus be doubly heavy. Therefore, Mahatmaji repeated, it was because of his inability to support them that he was so far unable to call upon each one of them individually to sever his connection with the Government *But ', said Mahatmaji, "let me ask the Government to take note that the moment I was convinced that the country had realised the full importance of handspinning and liandweaving from the national point of view, and the hearts of the masses had been drawn towards Khaddar, and further, the moment I should feel convinced that the soldiers and other Government servants were prepared to take easily to the spinning wheel and the hand loom to earn their livelihood after they had left their service, that moment, if I was left free by the Government, or I was not disabled in any way, I should personally make an appeal to every soldier or other servant of the Government to leave his service."

Then alluding to the perfect peace that there was then prevailing in the country in spite of the arrest of the Ali Brothers, Mahatmaji expressed himself as extremely gratified, calling the peace a "divine peace", because, as he said, it had nothing to do with the fear of the Government bullet. He believed that the hearts of the people were growing stronger and stronger day by day and it was only because of such strength of spirit that they were able to keep so calm. If regardless of Government excesses and wrongs, they could thus preserve the peace right up to the end, he was convinced that this Government would ultimately feel compelled to ask the people's forgiveness for the Punjab and the Khilafat wrongs.

But in this connection Mahatmaji cootinued there was one great obligation laid upon the people and it was this. They will have to discard every man and every woman among them all their fine foreign clothing and garments, as so much poisoo. And then he began to descant eloquently oo the virtues of Khaddar and ended his speech by a reference to the Moplah outbreak in Malabar and by once more Insisting on the vital need for Hindu Mostem unity. After he had concluded. Monlans Azad. Sobhani spoke followed by Mr. Yakub Hassan formerly a Barrister and now a Khilafat leader of Madras. The meeting broke up at 11 P.M. after which we returned to our place.

The next morning (20th September) Mahatmaji was escorted to the neighbouring town of Strangam by some of the local leaders. Trichinopoly stands on the river Cauvery which is here split into two branches with a beautiful island in the middle. On this island stands. Strangam with its great Vishnu temple of an all India fame.

On the ontskirts of Trichmopoly we had to cross the Cauvery by a badge about half a mile long beyond which stands Sarangam. The town is nestled among dense cocoannt palms through which Mahatmaji drove until he alighted at the Municipal office. The Municipal address was presented in a silver casket, which Mahatmaji accepted with the announcement that since he did not possess any box to keep such beautiful and costly gifts, the sale proceeds of the gift would go to the Tilak-Swaraj Fund. He then pointed out that the Srirangam Municipality, as indeed every other Municipality in India, should devote themselves specially to three items of work First, they must see that no foreign cloth was imported within the Municipal limits, and that every one used Khaddar, secondly, they must prohibit the use of intoxicants, and thirdly, they must get rid of the evil of untouchability This brief reply to the Municipal address being over, Mahatmaji was escorted by the elite of the town to a shady retreat in a neighbouring garden, through whose dense foliage the sun's rays could hardly There he was seated in a thatched shed, and an old blind pandit of Srirangam sang some sweet sanskrit verses in his praise All this while, the public of Srirangam were waiting in the open space to the south of the garden, anxiously expecting him So as soon as the Hindu orthodox ceremony of garlanding with flowers, putting on the sandal paste on the forehead and the presentation of the "eight, fold oblation" was over, and Mahatmaji having smilingly accepted the same he emerged from the garden, and presented himself before the assembled audience.

Here on behalf of the public, an address in English printed on palm leaves, in the old orthodox style was presented to Mahatmaj. In reply, he said that the printing, beautiful as it was, would have been doubly beautiful, if it had been written in Tamil, or in Hindustani, the common language of India. For did it look well to employ English amongst our own selves? English, of course, was indispensable for communication with foreign people. He was himself an admirer of Eoglish and he believed that there was moch in Eoglish for us to study Bot, as even the most beautiful thiogs looked ugly when they were oot of place so there was something locongruous in the use of English in the present instance. He wished however oot to be misunder stood becaose he had himself occasioo to ose English so often For truth to say whenever he found that Indian people were conversing among themselves with the help of English his heart broke within him for to him it betokened ooly the degradation of his country. He had collected, therefore a sum of Ropees fifty thousand from the Marwari community for the propagation of Hindi in the Madras Presi dency, and his advice to his hearers was that instead of frittering away their energies in the attempt to excel in a knowledge of English, they should seek to acqoire a com petent knowledge of Hindi

Then, he coocluded with a few words on the use of Khaddar and the removal of untoochahility. Everywhere in Madras he had been repeatedly urging on the people the oced for the removal of ootouchability as this particular evil was more rampant in Madras than elsewhere. On the oorth, the most serious problem that confront os io our national life is the problem of Hindo Moslem. Unity: while that of untoochability is the most crying evil in the sooth Io all that Mahatmaji said of untoochability in his speeches here he was specially keeping in view the conditions of South Iodia. After his speech was over we returned to Trichinopoly at 10 O Clock.

IN FAKIR'S ATTIRE

Leaving Trichinopoly on the morning of the 21 st September, we turned south towards Madura We were to make a few hours' stay at Dindigal on the way. We reached the place at 11 A M Almost the entire people of the town had turned out to receive Mahatmaji at the Station Reaching his appointed quarters, he began spinning, which always helped to refresh his spirits. There he summoned me to take a copy of an article he had written while in the train Then after his meal at noon, he went out to receive the address of the local Municipality Shortly after he had returned we had to get leady to attend the public meeting Meantime, Mahatmaji was engaged in witnessing an exhibition of the mairvellous skill in spinning by three old ladies of the place From the meeting we were to proceed straight to the station, where taking train about 4, we were to reach Madura before sun-down.

The meeting at Dindigal was quite as disorderly as the one we had a look at Kumbakonam. Nobody seemed particularly anxious to listen to Mahatmaji, but the one anxiety of everybody was to have a look at him. So while the audience busied themselves with their talks, Mahatmaji got through his speech somehow. When, after Mahatmaj's speech, Maulana Azad Sobhani rose to speak, I left the meeting, and taking a volunteer with me went off to the station. There I found a large body of sepoys (South Indian troops) patrolling the station under a European officer It was exactly such a body of Indian troops that we had seen at Waltair when Maulana Mahomed. All was arrested and the suspicion crossed my mind that Mahatmaji also might purhaps be arrested here. But the suspicion did not take root the similing face of the white officer in charge and his courteons demeanour dissipated my fears

Shortly after Mahatmaji arrived a tended by a large following Getting into the train he lost no time but proceeded to write something which he did very rapidly and when the writing was finished he gave it to Mr Rajagopala chart for perusal. As there was a suffocating crowd on the side of Mahatman's compartment. I accommodated myself at some distance from him. On the way there were monster gatherings at each and every station and at was a sight to see how enthusiastic they were. At Madura the crowd assembled to receive him was so tremendoos that until Mahatmaji had left it was simply impossible for any passenger in alight from the train and even after his depar ture it took some half an hour for the crowd to disperse from the platform From the Station he went straight to the place of public meeting while we made for our quarters. On our way we noticed that the people everywhere were in high glec and altogether the town wore a festive appear ance as on some day of great festival

Mahatmaji returned from the meeting shortly after we had arrived at our place. As at Kumbakonam and at Dindigal so also at Madum the crowd was so unconscionably large, and uncontrollable that he had to dissolve the meeting without making a speech. As soon as he returned he told me immediately to make three copies of the document he had composed in the truin and to send one of them to Mr Kasturiranga Iyengar, Editor of the Hindu, another to the Bombay Chronicle, and the third to the Independent * He next enquired if there was any Associated Press Reporter at the place, but not such reporter was available It was 11 PM when the copies had been taken, and they were forthwith sent off to be posted at the station. Mahatmaji had now devised his own plan of nullifying the objective the Government had in starting the prosecution of the Ali Brothers and their co-accused in the Karachi trial. The letters in question were letters of invitation to the various Provincial leaders to come and meet him at Bombay on the 4th October in conference to consider the issue raised by the authorities then wrote an article for Young India under the title "Tampering with Loyalty", in which he further elucidated his views In that article he declared, as he had done in his Trichinopoly speech, that the offence of tampering with the loyalty of the troops for which the Ali Brothers were being prosecuted at the time was no new offence at all, as the Congress had been openly committing it ever since the Calcutta special Congress of September, 1920, while the Khilafat Committee had been guilty of the same even earlier, while he himself had begun it earlier still made the further declaration that if only he had the ability to support them, he would have unhesitatingly advised individual soldiers, or other government servants to leave their services And as for the charge laid in the Karachi case against the Ali Brothers of spreading disaffection, it had now become the prime duty of the Congress to spread such disaffection. He called upon the people everywhere to hold thousands of public meetings, and read out in meetings assembled the famous Paters of Karachi. This portion of Mahatmaji's article was objected to his some of his associates on the ground that it might create undue excitement in the country but Mahatman refuted everyone of their arguments and then expressed the opinion that In coing to start prosecutions on the ground of the Farms the Government had really played into our hands so it really was. For when later on this lata i wa read ont to the public from a thousand platforms, and the duty of soldiers as laid down in the I they got broadcasted throughtout the country the last state of the Government became a grat than the first.

As the month of September was rapidly drawing to a close. Mahatmaji began to feel more and more convinced of the failure of the country to put forth the requisite energy determination and grit which he had been expecting of it in order that his Khaddar programme should be fulfilled in time. He had moreover been an actual eye witness to the Inghtfully disorderly conduct of the crowd in meet ings in Tamil Nadu and he felt more than ever that as long as the masses were not taught the element of the cinhaed corporate action, there was no hope of starting Mass Civil Disobedience in the country. And he had come also to believe more than ever that for infusing ideas of orderly and disciplined action into the minds of the masses so as to make them amenable to collective control, there was noth ing better than the Gospel of Khaddar. The supreme value of khaddar thus las in its capacity silently to induce this transformation of character, and that is why kliaddar is no intimately related to Civil Disobedience. The failure of the country to respond properly to the Khaddar programme made such a deep and painful impression upon his mind that Mahatman was now going to impose on himself a penalty—a penalty, partly by way of expiation, but partly by way of placing before the country an example to follow. The document which he had hurnedly written in the train at Dindigal, and which, afterwards he had asked me to copy and despatch to different places was a manifesto to the public, proclaiming that, as a sign of mourning, he would dis card for a month his dhots, vest and cap, and content himself with a mere loin-cloth, and, when needed an additional piece of cloth to be thrown over the upper part of the He called upon all those who were too poor to buy Khaddai, to adopt this sort of dress—the Fakirs dress, and remain satisfied with this irreducible minimum of clothing In that manifesto he also exhorted workers everywhere to suspend all other Congress activities for the time being, and concentrate for one whole month on Khaddar-production and Khaddar propaganda and fulfil the Swadeshi programme That night at Madura, Maliatman received visits from the members of different communities, but though he was freely conversing with everybody, he still appeared to me as wearing an unusually grave and thoughtful countenance A group of Hindu ladies learned in Sanskrit had in the meantime arrived, and they began to sing songs in Sanskrit in high praise of Maliatman. Then, at 10 P M a barber was called in to shave his head. The man came and first reverently took the dust of Mahatman's feet, and proceeded to shave with all possible care. He felt himself honoured at having had the high privilege of thus touching Mahatman's body, and he declined to take anything as remuneration for his work inspite of repeated offers made by us. The grave countenance which Mahntmaji now wore and his general behaviour at the time as also the manifesto to the public which we had seen in the original induced in the hearts of Mahntmaji's followers and associates a feeling of indefinite fear. It was clear in their minds that this change of costume was not meant to last for a month only some were even apprehensive that this was but the beginning of his life as a Sannyasim. There was thus grief in the hearts of us all and there was the shadou of anxiety on every face. With a heavy heart we all of us sat round him till late in the night, attempting by a word or two to divert him from his thoughts.

The next morning, Mahatmari was to journey by motor to Karaikudi a distance of some saxty miles from Madura. Mahatmaii rose very early and proceeded to change his dress. His cap and vest he altogether discarded and he had made a little Khaddar bag to carry the things he used to put in the pocket of his vest. Then he wore a new plece of khaddar not more than a cubit m width round his loins Mr Raiamanalachari and Dr Italan non came and employed all kinds of arguments to dissuade Mahatmail from his purpose Failing in all their efforts, they finally pressed him to wait for a few days more before taking the final step but Mahatmari gently explained his position and persuaded them to withdraw their request. First of all he assured them that it was no part of his intention to turn a Sannayan The new style of dress he was adopting he said was nothing strange to the people there for in the Madras Presidency people mostly went about with bare bodies

One who renounces the world and turns an ascatic

Again, in Madras Province, Khaddar was least in evidence, and the power of Khaddar least felt, nor was there any discipline or order observable among the people Looking -to all these things, Mahatmaji said his heart was bleeding and his present dress was but an expression of the intense pain he was feeling. He realised that this change of dress would inflict the heaviest of shocks on the hearts of the Guzaratis, and he knew that he was subjecting Guzaratis to a sore trial Therefore, he had pondered very deeply, indeed, before finally deciding upon this course Looking at Mr Rajagopalachari, Mahatmaji said with a simle-" I may not be able to convince you, but I am absolutely clear about the correctness of the step I have taken " Mahatman said he had woke up at three in the morning and all those early hours of the morning he gave this matter his deepest thoughts, and he went on to describe the solemn stillness of those hours, broken only by the music of the chirpings of He was going to say something more, but he seemed to check himself rather abruptly I alone had slept in his room that night I woke up once at 3 30 A M and turned my eyes towards him, but I had no suspicion that he was not asleep Being, however, much fatigued on account of the journey with my limbs aching, I had again fallen asleep

When he had completed his change of attire Mahatmaji made ready to start for Karaikkudi. Four cars were waiting at the gate to take him and his party. The people of Madura had left their beds betimes, and gathered on the road to have a sight of Mahatmaji. When he went and took his seat in his car in his new attire, all stood with their heads bent in sorrow and as the car set ont on its joinney the ruddy streaks of light of the rising sun fell full on his bare head and his bare limbs, and he looked a radiant mass of light.

The night previous Mahatman had told us that one one of us should accompany him to Karaikkudi, and so only Prabhudas had left with him. In the meantime the pain in my limbs had developed into a fever From my room I could see the "Gopuiam" of the celebrated temple of Many tourists from abroad come to Madura Madura merely to visit the temple Jamnadas went to pay a visit to the temple, and when he returned he broke out into ecstacies over its artistic beauty, and began to piess me repeatedly to go and have a view of that marvellous specimen of Hindu architecture I was, however, not in a mood to go While at Sreerangam I had similarly viewed from a distance the famous temple of the place Nor could I call up then and there, the necessary devotional spirit in which alone a diety should be approached Further, from the moment of Mahatman's assumption of the ascetic's garb, my thought lay wholly engrossed in the new situation. I felt that that was not the time for the study and understanding of our ancient national life and history, or for the appreciation and enjoyment of ancient Indian art and aichitecture

After Mahatmaji's departure, I was absorbed all day in thoughts of my own as to what I should do at that juncture. The new attire that Mahatmaji now put on befitted him and him alone. In his case, there could be the least suggestion of affectation or outward display. Mahatmaji's heart was bleeding at the sight of the poverty and distress of the teem ing millions of this country and anything that he might do to assuage his hearts anguish would be justified as being a natural expression of his most sacred feelings. But if others, who did not feel the same burning pain within them, took to the same course as Mahatmaji that would be a mere blind imitation or affectation and nothing else

So I began to analyse my feelings and came to the conclusion that I did not feel enough pain in my heart at the sufferings of my unhappy countrymen such as would justify me in following Mahatman and take up his vow Nevertheless the fact stared me in the face that I was there with him to serve him and be his constant personal attendant. Was it possible for me to be a daily witness to this bodily suffering of his and yet remain indifferent to the same not caring to share it with him? I suffered a good deal under the stress of these conflicting emotions. Then I began to look at the matter from another point of view. I naked myself 'Who could emulate Mahatmall in his purity, in his simplicity and his devotion to and love of truth? If so would it not be an act of senselessness on my part to affect. to approach Mahatman ever so little by copying his manner? But I had been getting attracted towards him and my admiration and reverence for him have been grow mg as the result of my constant association with him. From that point of view I thought, I should not be acting a part if I did something to satisfy that side of my character the result of cognations like these. I finally came to the conclusion that for a time at least I should forego the use of my vest, but that as regards the loss cloth, I must not adopt it.

Now, as I woke up next morning (23rd September) 1 found that my fever had completely gone. That very day 12 noon, we were to leave Madura, for Tinnevelly, and it was now long past the hour when Mahatman was to have come back from Karaikkudi Jamnadas suggested that Mahatman might have made straight for the station, and so we prepared to depart with all our luggage. Just at this time. Mahatmaji and party arrived There was only half an hour for the train to leave, and we must reach the station within that time. But when they all came, and saw the lack-lustre countenance of Mahatmaji and the rest of the escorting party, I felt an uneasy apprehension. Prabhudas said that I had done well not to come with them, as otherwise. I should have collapsed under the strain suffered terribly from the dust and heat of the road, as also on account of the crowds that had assembled on the way. However, we were all able to leave for the station in time to take the train for Tinnevelly

About sunset, the leaders of Tinnevelly met Mahatmaji at the station before Tinnevelly, and took him to Tinnevelly by motor Mahatmaji was thus enabled to avoid the crowd We reached Tinnevelly by train a little after sunset, and when we reached our quarters, we found Mahatmaji engaged in talk with the local leaders. Shortly, afterwards, he sent for me and asked—"Krishnadas, Kal tap ayatha? (Did you have fever yesterday?) I did not then know that "tap" was Gujarati for "fever," but I guessed that, having heard of my fever, he was enquiring about it. Then he questioned me as to the cause of the fever. I told him that I had been exposed to the fierce rays of the sun at Dindigal, and further at Madura in the place of bread and milk, I had to partake of Madrasi dishes prepared with chillies as one of its chief ingredients. Mahatmaji forbade me to eat Madrasi food again and as for the sun he said I must make my body strong enough to bear such hardships. Then he continued 'If yoo think it necessary to take rest for a coople of days you can do so and you may join me two days hence wherever I may be." I said there was no need for it, as I had shaken oi my weakness. Once again, he asked me if the constant journey by train was telling opon my nerves, and he was pleased to hear that I did not suffer now as before and that I was getting osed to crowds.

Then we had to prepare to go to the public meeting There had been an enormous increase of the floating ponulation in the town on account of Mahatmaji s intended visit. We were told that during the preceding three or four days streams of people from the villages had been pouring into the town as into some place of pilgrimage and the whole town was full. There was not, however much noise or bustle for all the crowd Mahatmail was supremely pleased to witness the perfect order and peace that prevailed In spite of the huge influx of people from the villages they had been admirably drilled to keep order and discipline by the Congress Workers. Here was an object lesson as to how easy it was if we only made some preliminary efforts to tralo our masses to accept disciplioe. and obey orders. Mahatmaji referred in his speech in the most eulogistic terms to this example of peace and order at the meeting and declared that he would have no fear of prosecuting his campaign when he should find established throughout the country a spirit of disciplice like to what he found here as part of the national character He declared that he was far better pleased at seeing this spirit of peace and discipline prevailing among the people here than at having been the recepient of public addresses or of contributions to the Tilak Swaraj Fund. Mahatmaji held that wherever there was much shouting and noise and excitement, it must be taken for granted that there the spirit of peaceful non-co-operation had not made much headway. To measure the defence in which the spirit of non-violent non-co-operation had advanced in the country, the test for him would be the degree in which the spinning wheel and the handloom had made their influence felt among the people. Such was the peroration of Mahatmaji's speech. It was nearly 10 P. M. when the meeting dispersed and we returned home.

Finding that Mahatmaji changed his old diess for a fakir's attire at Madura, Maulana Azad Sobhani also, when he reached Tinnevelly, discarded his old costume, and reduced it to the bare minimum sanctioned by Islam put on a waist-coat in the place of his shirt, put away his cap except during the time of namas (prayer), and substituted a lungs, reaching down to the knees for his pantaloons. He went up to Mahatmaji in the new attire, and explained why he had made the change He said that since Mahatmaji had changed his dress at Madura, he had been giving the matter earnest thought, and as a result had adopted this new The Maulana Saheb looked a veritable fakir, in his attire The next morning (24th September) people new costume were coming group after group for Mahatmaji's darshan. and the Maulana Saheb in his takir's dress seated himself at the entrance of our residence, and like a panda or priest at some place of pilgrimage began to call upon every visitor as he came to surrender his foreign clothing. His Urdu was, of course unintelligible to these folk hut he did his best to make himself intelligible by means of hints and gestures. Most people responding to his call parted with their foreign coats and shirts and they went to make a regular pile—while those who could not resist the fascina tion of foreign clothing turned and fied at the very sight of what was going on 1

Meanwhile a certain leader of the untouchable community came to meet Mahatman by appointment. He explained to Muhatmail the methods of work he was adopting to uplift the untouchables, and for securing for them their rightful place in Hindu society. From his talk it was clear that in the Madras Presidency the untouchables had no right of entry into Hindu temples and that this was the cause of much heart burning and much quarrelling The gentleman who had come to interview Mahatmail was a subject of the Travancore State and members of his community had not the right of entry into any of the temples there while members of other communities of equal social position emoved that right. His community had therefore resolved to make a forcible entry into one of the temples going in a body during the forthcoming festival. They were he said prepared to suffer the penalty which would be imposed upon them by law in case any riot ensued from their action. Mahatmaji while admitting the justice of their claim to enter the temples declared that they would not be justified in attempting to force an entrance in a body

Firstly, they were all sure to be sent to gaol for their offence, and secondly, if they provoked a not and got vanquished the law against them would remain where it was. But if after all, they felt that they had shaken off the fear of the gaol, then as a matter of conscience they may try peacefully to enter a temple in twos or threes at a time, instead of in a body, and thus go on filling the gaols. If that happened, the Travancore Government would feel compelled to revise the State Law in the matter assuming that the revision of the law was the sole object they had in view, then that object, Mahatmaji declared, would be far more easily served by the peaceful method he suggested than by the method of open violence which his compatriots were contemplating

The gentleman, now proceeded to make a clean breast of the whole affair Their object, he said, was not merely to secure the right of temple-entry but also to break the existing barriers against inter-dining and inter-mairiage imposed by the higher castes. These social restrictions, he said, his untouchable brethern had determined no longer to Mahatmaji did not seem quite pleased to hear all He explained that the removal of untouchability did not at all carry with it the implication that all restrictions in matters of food and marriage should be removed What he was aiming at was to see that the upper caste Hindus purged themselves of the feeling of repulsion against the touch of a fellow-being and that the untouchable classes received from the Hindu society the respect and dignity which must attach to all human beings, without distinction of class, colour or creed But if under cover of this movement, anybody wanted to destroy the rules and regulations governing a society in the matter of food and marriage, then he for one would neither extend to him his help or his sympathy

The untouchable interviewer was much surprised to hear all this from Mahatman's lips and so he contended himself with only the remark that in that case untouchability was not removed but would still remain rampant in society Mahatmaji s reply was as follows - Eating after all was an act of the body it was not an act of such high or holy duty that it required to be done in the presence of people. His view was that even a father was not bound to dine with his son Just as bodily acts like answering calls of nature are done privately so also taking one s food was better done as a private act. So also marriage must not be looked at from the view of mere bodily enjoyment it was an act which had as its objective the building up of future generations License in the matter of marriage was detrimental to the welfare of posterity. Therefore, the restrictions on marriage imposed by a society as the result of considerable experience must not be lightly tampered with. The gentleman was simply shocked to hear these views. He had imagined that in preaching against untouchability. Mahatmaji was after all aiming at the removal of all bard and fast rules in the matter of food and marriage. He seemed to have left Mahatmaji damb-founded

From early morning we were busy with our prepara tions for departure. As the train was to start at 9 we hurned to take our bath and after taking some light refreshments went off to the station. As I had not had any sleep the previous night, I thought I would quietly go to sleep, in the train and so picked up a convenient corner in a compartment at some distance from Mahatmaji's. But shortly afterwards, Prabhudas came in anxious search of me and said, "Bapuji has been trying to find you out for such a long while, and you are here, come quick", I could not guess at all what the urgency of the matter might be I came out. Mahatmaji was in the waiting room. Elbowing my way through the crowd, with great difficulty, I came into his presence. He handed to me some papers saying, "You have got to make copies of these papers quickly when do you think you can finish the work". I replied, "I am afraid it won't be possible to copy them when the train is in motion but when the train stops, station after station, I shall do the copying, and I hope to get through the work in the earliest possible time " He nodded assent Then, giving up all thought of sleep, I took paper and pen, and sat waiting for the train to stop at the next station In this way, I went on copying for some four to five minutes' time at each succeeding station, until the whole was finished at 2 PM I took the papers back to him, and he seemed so very pleased

ERODE COIMBATORE AND SALEM

From Tinnevelly the southernmost extremity of India we were unw speeding nurthwards. Reaching Madura at 3 P M. we took the Mail train from there and reached Trichnopoly at 8 P M. where changing train again we arrived at Erode at 3-30 A. M. Mahatman s programme was to proceed from Erode to Colmbatore and thence to Salem, thus completing his ton: in the Tamil Nadu

At the Erode station Mahatmaji was greeted by a vast throng of people who had been keeping awake the whole of the night in expectation of his coming visit. His night s rest being essential to Mahatmaji it had been arranged that his carriage should be detached and put on a siding at some distance from the platform so that he might pass the rest of the night in it undisturbed. When people assembled at the station were told of this they understood the position, and onickly left.

Prabhodas and Jamuadas stayed behind with Mahatmaji while I with the other members of the party, repaired to the residence of Mr Ramaswami Naicker the leading man of the place Performing my morning abintions early at dawn I waited in expectation of Mahatmaji. He was doing some of his writing work at the station and it was a little late when he arrived

Among the letters for Mahatmaji delivered at Erode was one from Dr Prapholla Chandra Ray* which, written about a month before, after having made a tour of the principal cities of India, at last found its destination here. There was another letter for Mahatmaji it was from a distinguished leader of the Congress Mahatmaji liad invited all the principal leaders of Lidia to meet at Bombay on the 4th October to discuss the situation in connection with the All Brothers matter The writer while strengly protesting against the step had used language towards Mahatmaji which was harsh and bitter Some of those present with us were inclined to make a laughing matter of the whole thing and wanted to ignore the letter But when it was read out to Mahatmaji, he listened to it with all attention. I could not detect even a trace of irritation on his countenance nor did he utter before his own people a word of disapproval of the kind of criticism passed against him. On the other hand, it seemed to me that he was feeling keenly within himself the pain which the writer must have felt when penning his Nevertheless, without bestowing further thought on the matter, Mahatmaji proceeded to reply to the first letter-Dr Ray's letter Evidently the harshness of the second letter had produced no corresponding reaction on his heart For how otherwise could he have, the very next moment, penned so affectionate a letter as the one he did to Dr Ray Referring to his first meeting with Dr Ray twenty years back, Mahatmaji wrote it was still fresh in his memory, and he expressed his yearning to meet him again and spend a few hours of most intimate chat with him It was his belief, Mahatmaji wrote, that he had not undergone any material transformation during those twenty years, and it was his hope also that when he met Dr Ray again, he would find him the same Dr. Ray he had known him before superscription was To Dr P C Ray I reminded Mahatmaji that Dr Ray was theo Sir P C Ray a knight, but his reply was that for him he was still the same Dr Ray

The meeting at Erode took place noder a large banyan tree beside a brook. The proceedings began with the presentation to Mahatmaji of various kinds of silver caskets with beautiful carvings made on behalf of the various communities living at Erode. They were oil sold by outtion on the spot and the proceeds credited to the Tilak Swaraj Food. Mahatmaji s speech at the meeting dealt with the various items at his programme viz. Khaddar removal of untoochability Hindu Moslem unity and his gospel of nonviolence. We lefts Erode for Coimbatore at 2 P M.

A little before evening Mahatoraji got down two stations before Combatore and left by motor Maulana Azad Sobhani and I accompanied him in his car

The Nilgiri range of hills stands in close proximity to Combatore The sun was sinking behind the hills, lighting up the western sky with its crimson rays while the shadows of the hills were falling over the booses and enveloping the whole valley below. Here for the first time we felt the cold of the atmosphere. We had to cover some eight to ten miles of countryside to reach the town. Oo the way at a nomber of places bands of villagers would be coming and greeting Mahatmaji with garlands of flowers, etc. Coimbatore produces an abundance of cottoo but the ryots as a class having been addicted to drink there was oo end to their sufferings. We were told that as the immediate result of Mahatmaji's movement some divine impulse had so possessed their souls that their character had undergood a miraculous transformation They had now altogether given up their habit of drinking, and the goddess of plenty had returned to their homes. And so with hands uplifted in gratitude their women had begun singing the praises of Mahatmaji. And though as yet the Charkha was not much in evidence, the conditions favourable to its spread had been revived.

Such were the stories of the simple joys and sorrows, the hopes and fears, of the countryfolk which filled our time as we proceeded towards Coimbatore, which we reached as the shades of evening were falling fast. As we were motoring to our appointed place of residence we saw in the midst of a wide extended level tract of ground thousands of men gathered around a raised platform and awaiting Mahatmaji's arrival We were given to understand that an address by the local municipality was to be presented here people sat so close as to leave no room for Mihatmaji to walk along and reach the platform, and so it became a problem how Mahatmaji was to be taken to his seat the decision was taken that there was nothing else to do but slowly to drive the car through the crowd The result was a terrible commotion and confusion among the people who were gathered near about the car On the other hand the near presence of Mahatmaji so elated their spiritis that they set up a loud chorus of joyous cries, which to us seemed highly unnatural at the time. It being utterly impossible to take Mahatmaji to the platfrom through that rush a strong built gentleman, one of the organisers of the meeting, came up dripping with sweat and made repeated offers to Mahatmaji to carry him on his own back on to the platform

But even while he was so speaking, he could not keep his own ground amidst the pushing and jostling and he fell down Mahatmaji stood up and made repeated efforts to calm the crowd hut all in vant. Then with the exclamation

Now this is horrible, I must get into the crowd and handing me his bag* and his chadder; he sprang out of the car into the midst of the crowd. It is reported that when at sea the waves are raising high oil is poured on the seething waters. And there is immediate calm. Something like this happened on this occasion. As soon as the people saw Mahatmaji mixed up in the crowed they instinctively stepped back in all haste to make a passage for him while Mahatmaji himself walking with rapid steps and looking neither to the right nor to the left made straight for the platform and took his seat there

The Municipal address contained high eulogies of Mahatmaji s self sacrifice, the services rendered by him to India and so on but it contained also a severe enticism of his programme of the triple boycott of schools and colleges of courts and of Councils. As soon as the reading of the address was over Mahatmaji gave his reply. His first words were words of praise to the members of the Municipality on their very out spoken enticism. He always felt delighted when he saw people speak ont their minds without fear. It was his certain conviction that unless the people were able to develop more and more the power of speaking out the truth against all odds they would never qualify for Swaraj

This portion of the reply over Mahatmail in words

Ever since discarding his vest at Madura, Mahatmaji kept a small hag in which to carry his papers and other necessary things.

† A piece of cloth locaely thrown over the upper part of the

breathing burning conviction said that for him the condemnation of his programme had no value whatsoever, as he knew it had proceeded from a complete misconception of the whole problem It was his certain belief that as long as our activities centred round Government schools, colleges, law-courts and councils, so long the winning of Swaraj must remain a dieam. That was why lie had recommended their boycott in the interests of the country If, indeed, the country was unequal to this modicum of self-sacrifice then it was idle to think of winning Swara; With these words he concluded his brief reply to the municipal address rose, and again made his way through the crowd into his Then the surging crowd surrounding him again took to shouting and cheering at the top of their voice, in the intoxication of joy In a few minutes however we had left the seething mass behind, and soon arrived at the place arranged for us Here we met hundreds of the labouring population of Coimbatore assembled in meeting. When Mahatmaji came into their midst they all kept their seats around a raised ornamented dais There was no commotion, nor cries of rejoicing This was a most agreeable surplise to us after our experience of the previous meeting, and it was an object lesson also as to how with some training and organisation beautiful order could be preserved at our public meetings. Mahatmaji got through the business of this meeting quite expeditiously and soon left for the public meeting Feeling that I must take some rest, I did not accompany him but stayed behind

The next day (26th September) being Monday, the day of silence, there was no crowd near him, and he was able to take some rest. While at Trichinopoly Mahatmaji had told me that wherever we might be it would be advisable for me to devote some part of time every day to spinning. In that way I would through practical experience he had told me get to know about the particular ments and defects of the spinning wheels in use in different parts of the country of Since then I was doing some spinning work every day and I noticed also that Michatman himself began to spin daily for at least half an hour. On that occasion he had also told me that Mondays were specially suited to be days of spinning Presently Mahatmali made it a rule to spin for half an liour before his midday meal, and if he failed to observe the rule on any particular day he went without his meal that day Only when travelling by train did he make an exception to the rule. In this connection I heard him one day to say

As the world supplies us with our daily food for the support of our body so we are in duty bound to render back to the world some dails service done by means of bodlly labour Everybody can fulfil this duty by working at the splinning wheel for sometime everyday keeping in view the world's good If we draw from the world our daily supply of sustenance for the support of our physical bodies with out making some daily return by way of physical labour it would be tantamount to committing theft.

इप्टान भोगान हि यो देवा दाखन्ते यक्तभाविता । तैर्दत्ता नप्रदार्थभ्यो यो मुहते स्तेन येव म ॥

Gita III 12

Ishtan Bhogao n hi vo de va Da syante yainabha vitah Tairdatha naprada yaibhyo yo bhunkte stena e va sah Gita III 12

(The Gods, propitiated by 'yajnas' (i. e) sacrifices, grant all your boons. He who enjoys these god-given gifts, without making any return is verily thief).

The above verse from the Gita, according to Mahatmaji's interpretation of it, is an authority for his view that we must do some bodily labour by way of service to the world in return for what we receive from it to support our physical bodies. And Mahatmaji felt that circumstanced as India was nothing else was more conducive to the welfare of her teeming millions as the spinning wheel. From this point of view therefore, regarding spinning as a sacrament, Mahatmaji took to spinning for a half hour at least every day.

That was our first Monday since leaving Trichinopoly, and I sat spinning for a long while near Mahatman meantime since morning, Mahatmaji had been writing an article for Young India entitled "Hinduism" This he gave me to read as soon as it was finished. The main purpose of the article was to show that untouchability was not an integral part of the Hindu religion. But incidentally Mahatmaji touched on many general aspects of Hinduism, and gave himself out as a Sanatani Hindu, (i e ,) a Hindu of the Orthodox school The article gave rise to an undercurrent of agitation in the anglicised circle or social reformers, as well as in the circle of the Orthodox (Sanatani) Hindus The social reformers protested that although Mahatmaji was an ardent advocate of the removal of untouchability, he had no faith in free social intercourse among peoples in the way of interdining and intermarriage. while, again, he gave offence to some of the orthodox. Sanatani Hindus by placing the Vedas in the same category with other scriptures like the Bible the Koran and the Zend Avesta Mahatmaji believed that the Bihle, the Koran or other Scriptures were as much divinely inspired as the Vedas The root principles of Mahatmaji s teachings were Ahimsa (non violence) Brahmacharya (self-restraint and chastity) and Truth with regard to which there could possibly he no difference of opinion among conflicting sects: nor could any Hindu who had any proper understanding of Hinduism, question his view that nobody had the right to arrogate to himself the high status of a Guru (spiritual guide) or even of a teacher of ruligion (Acharva) who had not built up his life on the foundations of self sacrifice continence and self-control and undergane a training in bearing liardships. For the truths of religion unfold themselves as by a natural law of evolution to one who regulates his daily life in accordance with the ideals of sacrifice, renunciation Brahmacharya Ahimsa and Truth So also it must be conceded by every spiritually minded man, that mere intellectual discussions on the doctrines and principles of religion to the exclusion of such regulation and purification of life might lead to the development of the intellect on the religious sale, but would never make a man religious Such being Mahatmali s views he declined to be drawn into a disputation in reference to his article on Hinduism for in spite of the many criticisms it provoked and the many letters of protest which came to him

We left Combatore on the 26th September at eight in the evening and reached Salem station at 1-30 A.M. but it was not till 3 that we arrived at our quarters. When I got up in the morning I found that Mahatmaji had gone out to attend the public meeting, but had left instructions for me with Jamnadas. The venerable Babu Aswini Kumar Dutt had published for free distribution among the people of Barisal, a leaflet in Bengali under the title, "Non-Co-operation and Ahimsa", explaining his views on the subject, and a copy had been sent by him to Mahatmaji. As soon as I awoke from sleep, Jamnadas put it into my hands asking me to prepare an English translation of the same for Mahatmaji. Accordingly, I got the translation ready in the course of the morning. Returning from the meeting, Mahatmaji looked over the translation and was delighted to know about Aswini Babu's views. In concluding his essay, Aswini Babu had quoted a beautiful couplet in Sanskiit from the Vana-parva of the Mahabharata, which was quite appropriate to the then circumstances.

Miiduna darunam hanta, miiduna hantyadai unam:

Nasadhyam mriduna kinchit, tasmat tivrataram mridu (The hard and the soft yield alike to the soft, in fact there is nothing impossible for the soft, hence the soft is more powerful than the haid)

MAHABARATHA,, Vana II, 8/61

Reading the translation in English, Mahatmaji was so pleased that he asked me to read it out in the original and wrote down the same for himself in Hindi script. That was the first time, he said, that he came to know of this couplet, and he spoke in high appreciation of it

Mahatmaji had a heavy programme at Salem, but he made time to pay a visit to Mr Vijiaraghavachariar, the venerable ex-President of the Congress, who was an inhabitant of the town. At Salem, a Municipal address was presented to him in a handsome sandalwood casket.

Previously to this Mr Rajagoapalachari had brouth this casket to us and had showed us the beautiful carvings. It was originally intended for Lord Willingdon the Governor of Madras, but the Municipality finally thought it fit to present it to Mahatmaji so we heared from Mr Rajagopalachari.

We left Salem after evening Dr Varadarajulu Naidu one of the local leaders, came in the afternoon with his wife and children to pay their respects to Mahatmaji Seeing some gold ornaments worn by his daughter on her arms Mahatmaji asked by way of a joke why she was wearing the ornaments when the Tilak Swanaj Fund collection still remained to be completed. As soon as the father explained to the girl in Tamil the nature of Mahatmaji a query she took off her ornaments without the slightest hestation and put the same into Mahatmaji s hands. At this Mahatmaji said to her again and again that he had been only joking still that little girl of some seven or eight years stontly refused to take the ornaments back.

National workers from the surrounding places came in large numbers to meet Mahatmaji at Salem. I heard him saying to one such worker that the time for holding meetings and making speeches was past, and that sort of service to the nation was no longer needed. The type of workers he now stood most in need of was such as would have the stamina silently to go on working and working and would when the occasion arose and without bitterness in their hearts, mount the scaffold. In reply to a question from another national worker Mahatmaji said that for three months that still remained to complete the year be had no wish to tour outside Guzarat for propaganda work. He would make Guzarat the centre of his activities for those three months, and if he thought that the time had come for a final reckoning with the Government, he would launch from Guzarat itself his campaign of mass Civil Disobedience for the winning of Swaraj

THROUGH THE ANDHRA COUNTRY

After completing his Tamil Nadn programme Mahatmaji left Salem for the Ceded Districts on the night of the 2"th September His original idea was in spend five days in the Andhra country but he now thought it necessary to expedite his journey to Bombay. So those five days were reduced to three Dnring these three days, from the 28th to the 30th therefore we had to spend all our time night and day in the train or at the stations. An account of the first of these three days is reproduced below from my diary.

Renigunta Junction: -28-9 1921 Leaving Salem last night we are now speeding uninterruptedly northwords Mahatmaji got down at Tirupati in the morning with Jamnadas and the Maulans Saheb There is a celebrated temple at Tirupati which throughout the south country is held in the highest esteem and reverence. I heard there were very few temples in all India equally rich. From Tirupati, Mahatmaji will motor to Renigunta where he will meet us. From Renigunta we are to proceed in Rajampet at 11-30 A.M. by special train. As it was inconvenient to take our luggage in Mahatmari s car Prabhudas and I came down here at Renigunta by train at 9 O Clock. The last three nights had been passed by us in the train third class the crowd was so great that we could hardly find sitting room for us and last night, I had to sit bolt apright till three in the morning I was fearing that to day

I might not be able even to move my limbs, but I had the advantage of a short spell of sleep from 4 to 6 in the morning, and I am feeling all right now.

Cuddapah - The special train left Renigunta at 12 noon, and stopped for a space of 40 minutes at Rajampet, whence it proceeded to Cuddapah, which was reached at 5 p.m The extra-ordinary rush of people at the Rajampet station will never be obliterated from my memory. It appeared as if they were going to smash the train? We were sitting in our own compartment; but even so we felt that we could not breathe freely. Mahatmaji got down among the seething crowd. The Maulana Saheb followed, elbowing his way. The meeting was held just by the side of the station. Mahatmaji soon returned, but I noticed that the brightness of his countenance had gone. The heated atmosphere of the crowd was too much for him. Yet I could detect no trace of annoyance in his features! The first thing he did when he took his seat in the train. was to take some plantains and oranges, and distribute them with his own hands among the little children there. I saw thousands of outstretched hands eager to receive what they considered to be a prasad,* from Mahatmaji. They were, however, disappointed. From among the crowd Mahatmaji singled out only the little children, and to them he gave away the fruits. And when the distribution was over he looked quite refreshed. I could see that he had enjoyed the act, and the colour returned to his face. Then; without taking any further rest, he opened his portfolio. and fell to work.

Last night and the whole of to-day were passed in the train. Having had no opportunity of taking a bath my brain has not heated At Cuddapah till 3 in the morning we passed the time at the station in the waiting room. The town is three miles off. Mahatmali went there to attend the public meeting with only the Maolana Saheb as his companion returning at 10 30 P.M. Then he lay down on a small cot on the station platform and asked me to gn to But there was no sleep for me and I merely sat recliced in an easy chair. There had been at Cuddarah a fairly good collection of money for the Swami fund and I was entrusted by Mahatmali with its custody. The people of this part of the country are very poor and on our arrival here in the evening the station officials warned us against thieves. Being in charge of the money therefore sleep was out of the question for me. At 12 30 PM a train arrived and fearing that Mahatmali might leave his bed under the idea that it was the train for us. I went and took my stand near him. Opening his eyes he noticed me, and asked what the matter was. I explained that a train had just arrived but it was not the train by which we shoold go he closed his eyes again asking me also to go and lie down I again went and took to that easy chair but there was no sleen. Then when our train arroyed at 3 s.M. we all went and got in. The train was so overcrowded that it was with no small difficulty that we coold secure a bare sitting space for ns

We reached Tadpatrl at 5-30 on the morning of the 29th September and were there till 1 P.M taking train for Kirnool at 2 P.M. All these days in the Sooth we had not come across a well-organised body of volonteers

but here at Tadpatri, we saw one such for the first time. The volunteers, of this place were clad in uniform, and had in their hands each a pole of the length of $3\frac{1}{2}$ cubits. When they marched with the poles on their shoulders they looked like soldiers carrying rifles. Wherever Mahatmaji went, they marched escorting him with the poles on their shoulders. Once or twice Mahatmaji just escaped injury to his eyes from a thrust from the poles. At the time of our departure from Tadpatri, Maulana Azad Sohani got each one of these volunteers to discard his pole.

Our labours were much lightened here at Tadpatri on account of the help from these volunteers. I had spent a sleepless night in the train and so on alighting from the train at Tadpatri, I could hardly think, I should be able to do any work after reaching our quarters. But the cool morning breeze dissipated all languor and fatigue, and exhilarated my spirits. The town is three miles off, and I went all the way in a bullock cart. Tadpatri is encircled by hills, on which the clouds rested so close as to make a lovely blending of hill and cloud. And the crimson rays of the rising sun penetrating the enveloping clouds fell on the valley below, tinging with a deep-red hue, and the enchanting loveliness of the scene had a most soothing effect on my nerves and my spirits

Mahatmaji and Maulana Azad Sobhani returned from Tadpatri town to the station at 1 P M and we took train again for Kurnool at 2 P M There were meetings at almost every station that we passed At every such station the Maulana Saheb made it a point to call upon the people to surrender the foreign caps they were wearing Some voluntarily gave them up, while others hesitated, but they had to hand them over to the volunteers. This created considerable commotion among people anxious to keep their caps and at some places I even noticed people leaving at the very mention of foreign caps. At a certain place the train happened to stop for a while at some distance before reaching the station when about a dozen people were seen queltly to approach us in expectation of having a sight of Mahatmaji. But when the Maulana Saheb stretched on his hands saying. Brothers, listen I they all beat a precipitate retreat taking their caps in their bands. Then Mauhan Saheb burst oot laughing saying. So the news had travelled here too!

In the way of passing the rest of the day and the whole of the night in the train we reached Kurnool the next morning (30th September) It was a season of draught in those parts, and looking out from the train the fields looks ed as though they had never known cultivation. We noticed heaps of stones lying at short intervals on the way The local people gave us to understand that famine striken people were engaged by Government to break these stones and were paid at the rate of 21% annas a day for men and 11/2 or 11/2 annus for women. But latterly the Congress Committee arranged for spinning work at a daily wage of three anuas for both men and women and so the labouers had in a body left stone-breaking and enthusiastically taken to spinning which they were allowed by the Committee to do in their own homes. Mahatmaji was extremely pleased to hear this news and from this one concrete instance we were able to realise what invaluable service could be rendered by the spinning wheel in districts visited by famine

At Kurnool we were the guests of a certain wealthy Hindu merchant. Our host had arranged for the performance of some Vedic ceremony to celebrate the auspicious occasion of Mahatmaji's visit, and sacred water, corn, etc., were sprinkled on Mahatman's body to the accompaniment of Vedic Chants Another Hindu merchant celebrated this visit by making a handsome present of money, making a display of the same by arranging the silver coins in rows. The whole amount was immediately credited to the Tilak Swaraj Fund. Kurnool boasts of a Muslim indigenous seat of learning which although established long ago is still in a flourishing condition. The Maulvis who have been educated here are honoured by Mussalman society everywhere in the South The present head of the Madrassah, by virtue of his selflessness and noble dignity of character is accorded the high honour due to a Pir * Indeed the serenity of his countenance, and the magnanimity of his character could not but attract people to him Mahatmaji paid a brief visit to the school, and made the acquaintance of the boys Then followed the public meeting on the broad bed of a large river Bengali readers might smile incredulously at hearing of a meeting held on a river bed, but in that season rivers in that part of the country were wholly without water, and as far as the eye could reach on either side, there was nothing visible but an ever expanding sandy waste At Kurnool the public could not have Mahatmaji with them except for a few short hours, but they made the most of this brief stay. They crowded round him, and thousands of people kept rill is after his carriage wherever he had occasion to go. Tir trail of these thousands of people made such a volume of sound that it could be heard from afar Thus seated in an open car with people closely following him the scene reminded me irresistively of the Biblical parable of the Shepherd and his Folk

RUMOURS OF ARREST

Our original idea was to motor to Bellary from Kurnool, but seeing that not more than one car could be secured, it was finally settled that we should go by train. Bellary being situated on the western extremity of the Andhra country, it was continuous with Karnatak, and the Congress Provincial Committees of the Andhra and the Karnatak both claimed jurisdiction over it An arbitration Board had been appointed by the Congress to settle the Telugu and Kanarese both were the spoken language of the Bellary district. In point of numbers the Telugu-speaking population probably formed the majority, but the Kanarese-speaking minority represented the dominant section, and the problem had thus got complicat-A similar boundary dispute had been pending between the Andhra and the Orissa Provinces, the latter claiming for itself Berhampore, in the Ganjam district Mahatmaji, when he came to hear of this from Mr Konda Venkatappayya, the head of the Andhra Provincial Congress Committee, said to him, "My heart bleeds for Orissa she is the most afflicted of our provinces she is the poorest I can undergo any amonut of suffering for her sake What Orissa desires, she must have, and there should be no contention Mr Venkatappayya signifying his assent, it was resolved to intimate the decision to Mr Prakasam, who had been nominated an arbitrator by the Andhra Committee

Arriving at Guntakal Junction we heard that from

5 P. M. a huge gathering was awaiting Mahatmaji s arrival at Bellary. It was past eleven at night when we arrived there. There was a tremendous rush of people at the station and the night was dark. Alighting from the train in the dark, we lost our bearings and could not make out which way to thrim. Mahatmaji got down and proceeded direct to the public meeting followed by all that vast congregation. When the crowd had thinned away our wits returned and we walked to the waiting room for shelter for the night.

From the meeting Mahatmaji returned straight to the station. It was then 1.30 A.M. He ordered his hedding to be spread on the floor of the open platform. I dld not go to sleep but sat by him keeping guard. So also were there so many other passengers lying on the platform all sleeping There among the motler crowd Mahatman was sleeping on the bare platform in the most unconcerned manner like any ordinary passenger and this set me athloging. I thought of his great name power and fame throughout the country and said to myself. He who was being regarded by the people as the virtual dictator of all India who was being received everywhere even as an Emperor and whose praises were being sung in frenzied strains by a thousand mouths from the highest to the lowest, in the country irrespective of age or sex -could be have gone to sleep like this if indeed name power and fame had made the slightest impression on his heart? By what divine strength has he succeeded in neutralising the intoxicating effects of the unexampled prestige and power which he commanded? In order to be able to swallow prescathed the poison of riches, honour, fame and authority the uneman insted man must be even like Shiva himself who had swallowed up the terrible poison, and so became the "blue-throated-God" Looking deep into my own impure heart, I now pictured to myself something of the degree of heart's purity required to enable a man to cast off the intoxication of fame and power and realise one's oneness with the world around and then with the added sense thus gained by me of the rare nobility, simplicity, and grandeur of Mahatmaji's character, I now prostiated myself mentally before him, again and again

While it was still dark, Mahatmaji woke up and got ready to leave Bellary At 5 A M the train arrived and we all got into it. Then the local leaders came from the town with the news that a warrant of arrest had been issued by the Government of Madras against Mahatmaji for his Trichinopoly speech, and that he was to be arrested on his return to Guntakai. On all of us, more or less, the report had a depressing effect, but Mahatmaji rejoiced over it exceedingly. I questioned one of our informants as to the truth of the report. He replied that they had obtained quite reliable information, and that both the District Magistrate and the Police Superintendent were with us in that very train, proceeding to Guntakal for the purpose of the arrest.

The train started The noble-minded Mr Venkatappayya, who was with us, asked Mahatmaji what, in the event of his arrest, was to be done at the meeting of all the Provincial leaders to be held at Bombay on the 4th October In reply, Mahatmaji advised him to go to Bombay and give full details of his arrest before the leaders, and then went on to say,—"Now there is only one work before the country, namely, the production and distribution of Khaddar There is no need for anything else, nor would it be desirable to fritter away our coergies over anything else. If we could bot give oorselves up wholly to the work of Khaddar then the whole of our object will be achieved " Maolana Azad Sobhani next enquired as to what he should Mahatman smilingly sald - Your duty will be to go about the country taking foreign caps from people who would be still wearing them He cotrusted Mr Venkatapnavva and Mr Harisarvothama Rao with the work of ponu larising Khaddar When Mahatmali had left for a wash Jamnadas, who was in another compartment came in and when he heard of the rumour about Mahatmairs arrest. with an emphatic gestore of his right hand he exclaimed. Be it so I don't mind I must accompany Bapuji into the prison I will say that Bapu* is an lovalid and he must have an attendant to look after him, in which case, I am sure I shall be permitted to be by his side. And so he requested Mr Venkatappayya to see that both Prablin das nod I reached Bombay in safety Thus each one among us had his duties cot out for him Theo when Mahatmaji returned from the wash he told Jamnadas that the Naparway $ should continue to be published as usual but that Young India must be stopped Seelog that he was oow speaking his last words of instruction to us all. I wanted to know what I should do in the circumstances. I put the question through Jamuadas. Mahatmaji looking at me said as follows - If the Government should at all allow me an attendant then you only would come with me to goal bot I am oot golog to make any request of the sort, A request like that would be beyond me In case no attendant.

is allowed, then you will proceed to the Ashram at Sabarmati and fix yourself up there. If you don't feel at home at Ashram you will go back to Mr. Mukern, your teacher at Our leave-taking being thus over, we waited in anxious expectation of the final act. Then, in order to divert us from the sad thought pressing heavily upon our minds. Maulana Azad Sobhani presented us with a riddle to solve - "Prove that Non-violent Non-Co operation will lead to Swara;" The friend to whom the question was particularly addressed, being unable on the spur of the moment to think of a proper answer resorted to the logical trick of trying to turn the tables on the opponent by a counter question At this the Maulana Saheb exclaimed-"Hallo! It is I who have put you a question, and it is I who must answer it! Quite logical indeed! Now do confess yourself beaten!"-and then Maulana Saheb with a wave of his hand in recognition of his having scored a victory, burst out laughing Mahatmaji who was closely watching this intellectual duel, was amused at this want of readiness on that part of one of his principal followers to answer such a simple question as that By his sagacity and foresight the Maulana Saheb had even then been able to envisage what would prove to be the question of the hour directly Mahatmaji had disasppeared from the field of politics behind prison walls. The full significance of the question, however, did not strike me then as it had done While all this loving quarrel and talk was going on the train was nearing Guntakal station. Mahatmaji with a sudden jerk of his body got up full of energy and full of cheer while the rest of us were anxiously looking out of our windows of the compartment to catch a sight of the display of troops in uniform on the platform. Nothing was to be seen however except that two red torbaned policemen were listlessly strolling about on the platform. At this unable to contain myself. I burst in sheer joy— All bosh, and Mahatmaji also responded with a smile. Meanwhile the Bombay Mail had arrived, and was waiting on the other side the platform ready to start. So we horried with our luggage and quickly got into it leaving Guntakal at 8 A.M. on the 1st October 1921.

RETURN TO BOMBAY

At 8 A. M., on the first October we took the Bombay Mail from Guntakal Passing through Raichur, Wadl, Sholapur and other big stations on our way we reached Poona at three the next morning. Mr. N. C. Kelkar the well known leader of Poona, came to the station to meet Mahatman From Poona we reached Bombay at 8 A M. As we were nearing Bombay Prabhudas told me that we were now approaching the very centre of the whole movement. He told me also that the white Khaddar cap the external symbol of the N C.O Movement was nowhere more in evidence than at Bombay At Mahatmaii a meet ings at Bombay he said lakks of people would assemble all wearing the white Gaudhi cap on their heads and then a wonderful sight would present itself. It would look as though the sea wave had left the sea, and towering high raged and foamed like a huge sea serpent with its white thousand hooded head. As I sat listening to Prabhudas s cuthusl astic eulogy of Bombay City and its greatness. I could not help feeling for the moment that to the eye of love there was nothing in the beloved which would not appear great and good

As the train reached the Borro Bunder Station (Bombay) a group of Khaddar clad volunteers met Mahatmaji to escort him from the train Mahatmaji s first care was to arrange for Maulana Saheb's departure for the Khilafat office, after which he proceeded to the residence of Mr Revashankar Jagjivan Jhawry in Laburnum Road Mr Revashankar was considerably older than Mahatmaji, and by profession was a jeweller. He had not received an English education, but a true jeweller that he was, he had not failed to pick out a true human jewel in Mahatmaji. How else was it possible for him to throw himself heart and soul into Mahatmaji's service? Mahatmaji on his part honoured him as an elder brother, and invariably sought his hospitality whenever he had occasion to come to Bombay

This was Mahatmaji's first visit to Bombay in fakir's Leaving Bombay just two months ago, he had toured as far as Aligarh on the north-west, Dibrugarh on the east, Tinnevelly on the south, and so having made an almost complete circuit of the sub-continent had come back to Bombay on the second day of October His was a sort of triumphal progress, which had flooded the country with a degree of enthusiasm unknown before since at Calcutta, standing before the representatives of the whole of India in Congress assembled, and expounding to them his doctrine of Non-co-operation, he had proclaimed in solemn accents that, if the programme of work laid down by him for the country was truly carried out, and if the spirit of peace and calm could be preserved throughout the land then the winning of Swaraj within the space of a twelve month was a certainty Since that momentous pronouncement a whole year had passed and consequently the eyes of all India were now turned towards him again his chief associates, the Ali Brothers, had been arrested and were being prosecuted at Karachi Lastly, the progress of the Khaddar movement having fallen far short of his hopes Mahatmaji had discarded his customary dress and put on the mendicant s garb. As the result of these concurring events popolar hopes and expectations and the excitement and restlessness to the country had been rising higher and higher and when it became known that Mahatmaji had returned to Bombay people began to flock to have a sight of him in his new garb.

Here at Bombay I met for the first time some of Mahatmah a principal associates. As all of them were in a special sense Mahatman's coadjutors, and were closely connected in various ways with many later events. I think it would be best to introduce them here to my readers Soon after our arrival a gentleman some thirty five years of age came and greeted Prabhudas and Jamnadas with many friendly enquiries as to their health etc. He had a peculiar way of smiling it was through his eyes for it seemed to me that his heart had its seat in his eyes. The slightest alterations of feeling whether of approbation or disapprobation satisfaction or dissatisfaction were mirrored in his eyes like the interplay of light and darkness or of sun and rain. He had therefore not to waste many words to give us an insight into what passed within him. I learnt from Prabhodas that the gentleman in question was no other than Mr Shankerlal Banker the then Secretary of the Bombay Provincial Coogress Committee

In his company came a certain fair lady who was however trying her best to suppress her joy at Mahatmaji s return bot an occasional word or two betrayed her. It seemed as if she was getting somewhat distracted onder the stress of conflicting emotions as to whether she should put the reins on her feelings, or let go herself. Then another lady, who was standing near her, tried to rouse her from her abstraction, calling out to her,—"Anasuya! Anasuya!" I could then make out that she was no less a person than Miss Anasuya Ben, the well known Labour leader of Ahmedabad

She who called Miss Anasuya Ben by her name seemed to have copied the ladies of Bombay almost in every detail, in her dress, her outward bearing and gait, etc., but still I thought I saw that she carried about her person something of the atmosphere of my native Bengal soil of Bengal is tertile, and her green loveliness charms and fascinates the eye. In addition, Nature, with lavish hands, has endowed her, and has built up her individuality by investing her with the qualities of softness, sensibility and changefulness All these distinctive features of Bengali character, I thought, I saw mirrored in her countenance Having now toured the other provinces of India, I had be become all the more clear in my mind as to these vital elements of Bengali character, and I had not much diffi culty therefore to make out that this lady was Mrs Saroini By the spontaneous flow of her English as well as by her skilled command of language breathing poetic fervom, she astonished and charmed her audience Mahamaji humorously called her by the name of "Bulbul," the Indian Nightingale.

There were also two other gentlemen here to whom Prabhudas and Jamnadas showed great deterence. One of them, I learnt, was the great leader of Guzarat, Mr Vallabbhar Patel, but he was so grave-look-me and spoke so little that I could hardly realise how he had managed to rise to the position of a leader of such eminence. The political life of Guzarat was then being silently moulded and built up under the dominating influence of Mahatmaji and in the circumstance it was no wooder that silent workers like Mr. Patel should have come to win for themselves a high position in the political circles of that Province Such men would never have attained to position of leadership in provinces where political work began and ended in speech making. His companion I was told was Mr Lakshmidas the organiser of Khaddar work in Guzarat This gentleman was so plain and noostentations looking that he went about with no vest on and had only an ordinary towel thrown over his body It was not easy therefore at the outset for ontoders to discover for themselves what an efficient worker he was or how great his parts were

Bombay being the very centre of Mahatmaji s activities I found that there were a whole host of people attached to him and anxious to serve him. He spoke to almost all of them in his mother tongue the Guzarati and mixed with them on easy and familiar terms. No looger did I find him speak with such slow deliberation as I had heard him speak before in English or Hindi. People would be pouring in, group after group and putting him question after question while he oo his part would engage himself in frank and earnest discussions with them all. I could not understand a word of Guzarati and therefore although surrounded by people I was feeling lonely and was left to the resources of my own mind to occupy myself with as best as I might. Besides being a new man I felt shy and could not come near Mahatmaji's presence without some little internal struggle. He, however, would send for me, and keep me engaged in some kind of work or other. Thus the whole of the day in question up till eight in the evening Mahatmaji was occupied in the manner described, and then he went out, returning home I did not know when, for I had already fallen asleep

The next day (3rd October) was Monday, and he was under his vow of silence There were no people with him now, and alone I sat by his side, keeping guard midday Jamnadas came with certain telegrams Mahatman, and then left when he had got the answers the morning Principal Dhruva of the Benares Hindu University called on him, and had a lengthy talk with him in Mahatmaji wrote down his own questions, as also the answers to Mr Dhruva's questions From the tenor of Principal Dhruva's talk, I could gather that Pandit Malaviyaji was as much exercised over the possible fate of his Benares Hindu University as Sir Asutosh Mukerji, the then Vice-Chancellor, was over the future of the Calcutta University, which was then being boycotted in increasing numbers by its students I got the impression that, having regard to the circumstances, Principal Dhruva was pressing Mahatmaji to devise a scheme of national education such as would be satisfactory from every point of view. I could not make out whether the request was made on behalf of Pandit Malaviyaji or not

Throughout the day Mahatmaji was busy writing for the Navajivan.* Then at 9 P M, he abruptly left his room, and went up alone to the terrace. He returned some 15 or 20 minutes after and straightway began composing something with all speed. All this while I sat by his side and when he had finished he wrote to me on a bit of paper. Make as many copies as possible in large hand keeping double space on foolscap paper if we have any Providing myself with some paper and sitting near Mahatmaji I began copying. Then he again wrote to me 'Tell Prabhudas to make my bed. When the bed was ready he at once took to it. It was then 9-30 P. M. Feeling that if I went on with my work in the same room Mahatmaji s rest might be disturbed on account of the light, I came back to my own room and did as many as eight conjes by 12 O clock midnight.

The next morning Mahatmajl got up very early while it was still dark and went out for a wash. I had gone into his room and was engaged in pinning up each copy sepa rately when he retorned and asked me how many copies I had done. Learning from me that I had made eight copies he said "You did all the eight copies overnight? I wanted to tell you that three copies only would have done but now that I have eight copies it would be all the better for my purpose

BEGINNINGS OF CIVIL DISOBEDIENCE

It was Tuesday, the 4th of October Leaders from the different provinces had assembled in meeting at Bombay in response to Mahatmaji's invitation. Mahatmaji had made up his mind to publish a manifesto over the signatures of all these leaders I have described in the previous chapter the circumstances under which that manifesto was composed. Though it was prepared at such short notice yet its method was so perfect that it was a delight to read it Mahatman was now expecting to get all the leading men of India in a body to commit, regardless of the frowns of the Government, the identical offence for which the Ali Brothers had been arrested. In the diast manifesto it was stated that -it was the inherent right of every Indian to express his opinion with full freedom about the propriety or otherwise of citizens offering their services to, or continuing to remain in the employ of, the Government, whether in the civil or the military department. The manifesto then declared that, in the present cucumstances of the country, it was wrong not only for Mussalmans, but for every Indian, of whatever persuasion, to serve in the Army, or any other Administrative Department of Government And it ended with an appeal to every Government servant to resign his place, and take to the production and propagation of Khaddar with a view to earn his living

Since the morning, news had begun to pour in of the arrival of the leaders from the different provinces. The

Northern coutingent was made up of Lala Lajpat Rai from the Punjab, Hakim Saheb and Dr Ansari from Delhi Pandit Motilalji Maulana Abdul Bari Maulana Hasrat Mohani Pandit Jawharlalji and Mr Mahadev Desai from the United Provinces Mr Rajendra Prasad from Behari and Maulana Abul Kalam Azad Mr Shyamsundar Chakravarty and Mr Jitendralal Banerji from Bengal From the South came Mr Rajagopalachariar of Tamil country (Madras Presidency) Mr Venkatappayya of the Andhra country (Madras Presidency), Mr Deshpande of the Kamatak and Mr Kelkar of Poona, as well as other Maharashtra leaders Although the meeting was arranged for 3 in the afternoon still from the morning mauy of the leaders had been coming to Mahatmaji for consultation to some of whom Mahatmaji gave copies of his draft manifesto

Mr Chotani the milliomaire merchant of Bombay, and the then President of the Khilafat Committee had just returned from Europe. He called on Mahatmaji with Mr Mushir Hussain kidwai and Manlana Hasrat Mohani and was anxious that Mahatmaji should convert his two friends to Mahatmaji's way of thinking. The whole movement was so much love's labour lost,—such was Mr Kidwai's opiniou. He had a peculiar roundabout way of expressing himself. By character Maulana Hasrat Mohani seemed to me like a solld mass of moving rock.

It appeared as though those who would come in collision with him were bound to go to pleces under the shock of impact. His steady look and the metal lic ring of his voice bore witness to the solidity of his character and the rare quality of holding on to his couvic tion at all hazards. The Manlana when he heard Mr Chotani making his request, said to Mahatmaji, "No, no, I am not opposed to your views, only I do not think that we ought to lay so much stress on Khaddar. In my view Indian mill-made cloth is equally Swadeshi."

Maulana Abdul Bari Saheb had come from Lucknow He looked like a molten ball of iron. His influence over the Mussalman community was unbounded. Seeing Mahatmaji wearing his loin cloth, which did not reach up to his knees, the Maulana said, "We have all to come and see you, but it is against our scripture to keep the knees bare in this fashion", at which Mahatmaji hurriedly covered up his legs with the piece of loose cloth that he had to cover the upper part of his body, and laughed and said, "Now it is all right, I suppose"

Pandit Jawharlalji was sitting quietly by the side of Mahatmaji, reading that day's Bombay Chronicle Seeing Mahatmaji mentioned as "Mahatma Gandhi" in an Assam Government Communique, he said with a laugh, "This is perhaps the first time that a Government Communique calls him a Mahatma"?

In the meantime a certain turbaned Sadhu wearing ochre-dyed clothes had come self-invited to see Mahatmaji, believing himself to have been inspired with a special message for Mahatmaji. Since morning he had been waiting and waiting unable with all his efforts to catch. Mahatmaji's eye, for Mahatmaji was wholly absorbed in consultation with the leaders. Finding his case hopeless, he at last sought the help of Mr Chotani, who, a good-natured gentleman that he was, found it perhaps difficult, specially in those days of Hindu-Moslem entente, to disregard a man dressed as a Sadhu. But Mahatmaji came to his rescue and sternly rebuked the Sadhu saying — How dare you be so rude as to waste the precious time of Mr Chotani. This saved Chotani Mian From this incident I could see that Mahatmaji despite his habitual gentleness of manner was not the man to put up with any kind of rude or foolish meddlesomeness.

The Leaders Conference met at 3 r v The original proposal was that it should meet in Mahatmaji a room, but fearing that his room might not be spacious enough a separate place had been secured by the side of the Chow pathy Road near Mr Shankerlal Banker's residence. It was only about five minutes walk from Maliatman s lodging A little before the appointed hour Mahatmaji walked to the place with Mrs Naidu and some eight or nine others I too followed Seeing Mahatmail coming to the meeting with his body bare (but for a small bit of cloth round his loins) while holding a bag in his hand the old Abbas Tyebii Saheb of Baroda burst out laughing and clapping his hands jestingly said- See Mahatmaji has turned mad but not merely that he has devised a new way of making others mad also In response Mahatmair also laughed most heartily

When the meeting began it fell to me to keep guard at the entrance. It was not a public meeting and none but those who were well known to us or had been invited were to be allowed to enter. Mahatmaji sat in the centre, and on his right were all the Mussalman leaders sitting on their heels in Durbari fashion. This lent an additional dignity to the scene. The Muslim gentry seem to have preserved intact the customs and traditions of the olden days of Muslim rule, but the Hindus have no recognised convention as to how to sit when assembled in meeting. Mrs. Naidu, Pandit Motilalji and other Hindu leaders took their seats to the left of Mahatmaji Mahatmaji first read out the English draft of his manifesto to the audience, and then gave an Urdu translation thereof Then the discussion The Mussalman leaders mostly kept silent, nor did those also who were Mahatmaji's immediate followers in the Non-co-operation Movement make any criticisms. I had an impression from what I had read in the Press that Lala Lappat Rai was not much in sympathy with Mahatman's views, but here it seemed to me that he had undergone a complete change But the Maharashtra leaders kept on raising objection after objection almost to every word and line of the draft The very mention of the spinning-wheel, the handloom and Khaddar raised quite a storm of opposition from them Mr Vithalbhai Patel, Mr. Kelkar, Mr Jayakar, and Dr Moonn were the severest of the critics Mr Rajagopalachari of Madras argued for a while in support of Mahatmaji His was a keen intellect, and he was very clever in refuting the arguments of his opponents Lalaji and Motilalji tried to weigh both sides and arrive at a compromise between the contending points of view This was my first experience of the proceedings of a "Committee meeting" of leaders, and I was rather alarmed at the parade of hair-splitting argumentation Here, for the first time, I came to realise under what difficulties Mahatman had to get his work done, and the discovery pained me I could very well understand that in ordinary circumstances at a gathering of leading exponents of divergent views, keen debates like this would be quite in their place But here, Mahatmaji was about to take his plunge and engage in a terrible stringgle with the Government. At such a time as this, the sort of the debate I writessed hardly appealed to me. He could of course have gained his point by the sheer weight of his majority and it was a revelation to me to note with what patience courtesy and consideration Mahatmaji would listen to the arguments, however subtle put forward by the other side

As a result of the discussion the language of the statement was considerably modified, but the substance remained much the same. There was, however, one unportant modification. In the original draft those who would leave Government service were asked to turn to the spinning wheel and Khaddar, but in the final draft they were advised merely to take to such means of earning their livelihood as would be consistent with their self respect. I felt that much of the art and beauty of the original draft was lost in the process of dissection to which it had been subjected. Some time before sunset I had been once to our lodging to bring Mahatman his meal. On my return I found that Mr Mahadev Desai had made a fair copy of the revised statement and placed it before Mahatman. He first aftixed his signature to it the other leaders followed and it was not till seven that all the signatures had been taken.* I was feeling very tired and so I left the place of Conference and returned to our quarters.

It was 9-30 P M, when Mahatmaji came back from the Conference. I heard that a rumour was circulating that Mahatmaji was going to be arrested that very night on a charge of inciting soldiers and the police to leave Government service, and that was why he had been discussing matters till that late hour with the leaders, explaining to them the lines on which, in the event of his arrest, the movement had to be conducted. As I was the only person who passed the night in Mahatmaji's room, Jamnadas told me again and again that I must make sure that Mahatmaji was not taken away privately, and that if the police did actually turn up, I must not fail to rouse the whole house

When Mahatmaji returned, he looked very much tired, and he instantly laid himself down on his bed The weather being too warm, he asked me to fan him, but a few minutes after, all on a sudden he exclaimed-"Write" brought pen and paper, and sat down to write He dictated to me the Resolutions that he proposed to bring before the Working Committee The reference to the spinning wheel, the handloom and Khaddar had been deleted from the Leaders' Manifesto, but here in the Working Committee's Resolution Mahatmaji inserted it This draft Resolution stated that those who would leave the army or the police should after undergoing a short course of training be able to earn an honourable living by handspinning and handweaving Further, it was stated that the Khaddar Propaganda had fallen far short of the Committee's expectations, and that an All-India campaign of Civil Disobedience was not possible so long as the boycott of foreign cloth had not been completed, and every district and every Province had not become self-contained in the matter of Khaddar-production Then another Resolution stated that there should be a general voluntary hartal throughout India on the day of the landing of the Prince of

Wales in India. At eleven in the night Mr Jairamdas of Sindh came to see Mahatmaii Mahatmaii then asked me to resume fanning while Mr Jairamdas went on writing to Mahatmaji s dictation When all the draft Resolutions of the Working Committee had been taken down, Mr Jairamdas suggested that in view of the rumours of his arrest that very night, Mahatmali would be well advised to tell the people the manner in which the work of the movement was to proceed during his absence Accordingly, Mahatmaji dictated a message under the In the Event of My Arrest which was to be published in the Bombay Chronicle It was 11-40 P.M. when the writing was finished. In the mean time Mr Mahadev had gone to wire the Leaders Manufesto all over the country and also to deliver a copy to the Bombay Chronicle office for publication. It was then mulnight but Mr Mahadev had not returned so Mahatman felt a little surprised Mr Jairamdas wondered if Mr Desai had not been arrested on the way with the Manifesto in his hand After midnight Mr Initamdas left us, and Mahatmaji also was about to retire At 12-30 a messenger from the Bombay Chronicle office came in. Scarcely bad I dismissed him and put out the light and gone to bed when Mr Mahadev returned and knocked at the door Mahatman immediately summoned him and questioned him in Guzarati on many matters. I could not follow the talk but I could gather that Mr Mahadev had done his work most creditably and I quite realised that if he could be always by Mahatmaji's side be would be a great help to him in every matter

On the publication of the Manifesto in the Bombay 17

Chronicle next morning a great wave of excitement and enthusiasm passed through the city. The news at once spread among the general body of people that forty of the most distinguished leaders of India had individually taken upon themselves the responsibility of calling upon all Government servants, including the soldiers and police, to resign their posts under Government. Mrs. Sarojini Naiducame in the morning and intimated to Mahatmaji that even the English residents in the city were astonished and alarmed. At the Taj Mahal Hotel, where she had been staying, several European boarders had come and said to her, "What do you mean? Are you really serious?"

At 12 noon the Working Committee met, and all the proposals of Mahatmaji were accepted. The same day almost all the leaders left for their respective provinces Mahatmaji enjoined upon them all that their primary duty should be to maintain peace and order in the country and spread Khaddar. The same day evening (5th October), Mahatmaji also left for his Ashram

HARD AS ADAMANT

A very large crowd had assembled at the Colaba station (Bombay) to see Mahatmali off Everybody had his white Khaddar cap on yet nobody would care to keep the peace. It was time for the train to start, and yet, owing to the terrible rush and confusion, we could not put our Ingrage in the train. Jamnadas who was directing the work got excited and shonting at the top of his voice, hegan to scold the people, but got no hearing. Unable to understand a word of Guzarati, I could only distinguish the single syllable chhe chhe chhe chhe in every month Surrounded by the crowd it was very difficult for me to get in, but I had my opportunity and slipped into the train Seeing that no luggage of ours could be carried to the train Mahatmaji stood at the entrance of his compart ment, and so far as I could see he gently reproved the crowd for the "tyranny of their affection. On the instant the noise and hubbub ceased. Then in all hnrry we took hold of our laggage and put it in the train which left within a few seconds.

In the train we were a large party including Mr Rajagopalachary Miss Anasuya Ben and others. Anasuya Ben was in the same compartment with Mahatmaji. When once
I happened to be there on some business, she enquired of Mahatmaji abont me In Mahatmaji's reply I could only distinguish the word Vaushava, and I thought that probably Mahatmaji had taken me for a Vaushava

Returning to my compartment, I took my seat by the side of Mr Rajagopalachary Mr Achariar began discussing with me Mahatmaji's article on "Hinduism" in Young He pointed out to me that Mahatmaji had passed a verdict of severe condemnation on Untouchability and yet had set his face against inter-dining and inter-marriage Rajagopalachariji went on arguing whether these two positions could at all be reconciled with each other When we reached the Ashram, he questioned Mahatmaji on this very point Mahatmaji's answer was that as a believer in the Law of Karma he was not in favour of going against the time-honoured rules in regard to marriage, food, etc. prevailing in Hindu Society But he had declared war against untouchability simply because in the name of untouchability the lowest classes were being subjected to great oppression, and even denied the elementary rights of human beings, which denial constituted in his opinion an offence against religion itself

At Bombay we had had to bid good-bye to Prabhudas Mahatmaji had directed him to go and work in the Ashram at Wardha* I was much pained to notice how castdown he was when we left him Then, as I was conversing with Mr Rajagopalachary, Jamnadas came from Mahatmaji in an excited mood and said "My death-warrant is signed" We enquired what the matter was and heard that it was Mahatmaji's intention to send him to Rajkot† to do handspinning and hand-weaving work there For Jamnadas it was indeed a cruel stroke of fortune and as good as a death warrant since he had to leave Mahatmaji at once. So also at the time Mr Mahadev Desal, Mahatmaji's devoted disciple and associate was at Allahabad working for the Independent newspaper He could not bear to be away from Mahatmail for loog bot when Mahatmaii had once made up his mmd as to where any of his followers should go to work and what that work should be there was no way of getting him agree to the cootrary. One day after the evening prayers at the Ashram, I noticed that some three or four important persons all devoted to Mahatmaji were moving heaven and earth to make him agree to a proposal of theirs but Mahatmaji was adament. Then I discovered that, however soft and gentle Mahatmaji might otherwise appear to be by nature he was very unyielding. After closely listening to all that those gentlemen had to say Mahatman dismissed their case with the laconic answer -I do not at all understand what you really mean. Various little incidents of this kied impressed upon me the conviction that by no amount of pressure whether by way of entreaty or inducement, could you expect to exploit him for your purposes.

^{*} In Central Provinces where Seth Jampalalu had started an Ashram on the lines of the Ashram at Sabarmati

[†] Rajkot is in Kathiawad in Guzarat where Mahatmaii had passed his early years and had an ancestral dwelling house

All this I mention with a view to bring oot one vital fact of his character. He was so constituted by nature that by oo amount of submissiveness or devotedoess of service could you exercise any sort of personal infloence on him. The general rule is that people have got to do many things merely because they feel drawn to or are dependent opon others in respect of something or other. Thus in the case of some ties of blood are an important factor which makes them unable to assert themselves while again there are others who are won over by smooth words and the application of a judicious dose of flattery. But in the case of Mahatman, it was clear that the moment he had decided on a course that he considered to be right and proper, he would pursue it, to the end, without at all minding whether by so doing he had to act contrary to the wishes and request and even the ardent desires of his own people engaged in rendering unstinted personal service to him, or of those who were his devoted followers and adherents. Thus he would not allow his intellect or his judgment to be clouded by love or passion getting the better of him. I had heard from his own lips that on one occasion there was a sharp conflict of views between his wife and himself on the question of untouchability, and then he had felt compelled to ask her to leave the Ashram and live elsewhere to please herself single incident is enough to show how stern and unbending Mahatmaji could be where the interests of Truth and Justice were at stake

THE ASHRAM AT SABARMATI

The Guzarat Mail reached Ahmedabad at 8 A M on the 6th October Beyond Ahmedabad is the Sabarmati station whence the Ashram is but a mile off. But the Mail train does not stop at Sabarmati, so we had to get down at Ahmedabad from where the Ashram is some four miles distant

Ahmedabad is noted for its cotton mills. The ascendency of machinery in the life of the city is visible every where it has entered so to say into its very bone and marrow. By this constant contact with machinery and iron and steel the external features and the internal temper of the city have undergone a strange transformation, and become as hard and dry and lifeless as iron itself.

The public of Ahmedabad were now filled with joy and enthusiasm like what people feel when their own King returns home like a conquering hero from a foreign expedition and they had gathered in their thousands to accord a warm welcome to Mahatmaji. Alighting from the train he took Mr. Rajagopalachary with him and went straight to the Ashram Then when the hinge crowd had thin ned away, we put all our luggage in a motor forry and left.

Advancing a little distance we reached the river Sabarmati. Crossing her by a metalled bridge we reached the other bank whence runs a road parallel to the river leading due north to the Sabarmati station. After the traveller had gone some three miles along that road the sight of an open field dotted over with a number of newly built houses would suddenly arrest his eye. This is the celebrated Satyagraha ashram of Sabarmati. It stands on either side of the public road covering a total of a hundred and fifty acres of land. To the east of the Ashram is the Sabarmati river flowing south, and on the other side of the liver lies the city of Ahmedabad extending lengthwise from north to south along the river bank. Only a few years ago, Mahatmaji had pitched a small tent here, and laid the foundations of the Ashram, which has since developed into its present dimensions.

Further beyond the Ashram the road runs for another mile till it reaches the Sabarmati station Close to the station is the Sabarmati gaol, which is one of the principal gaols in the Presidency of Bombay, providing accommodation for some twelve hundred prisoners. The Ashram, the Gaol, and the Station,—it is these alone that make Sabarmati known to the outside world, it is these three that give distinction to the quiet little village.

I have already said that the Ashram stands partly to the east, and partly to the west, of the public road. At the eastern extremity stands a fairly large cottage facing the river, in which Mahatmaji lives. There is an open verandah in front of the cottage, where Mahatmaji sleeps all the year round. Even in winter he sleeps there. I have heard from his own lips that he could not have sleep unless he had a sight of the sky when lying on his bed, and that it was a very old practice of his to watch the stars in the depth of the night. On the south of the verandah is Mahatmaji's sitting room, where he sits the whole day doing his work. Besides, there are four other rooms in this cottage.

A little to the right of Mahatmaji's cottage " on the very edge of the river bank is a clear open space of ground where every morning an hour before sunrise and every evening after sonset all the inmates of the Ashram men women and children gather together and chant the sweet name of God, and recite in chorus verses from the Gita There have been occasions when the presence of Mahatmaii and the magnetism of the place conspired to make the prayer almost an inspired act. The fast flowing river in front and the vast open sky above with the occasional appearance of the moon casting its silvery beams on the spot now in early morning now in the evening, enhance a hundred fold the intrinsic sweetness and solemnity of the prayer When Mahatman happened to be at the Ashram he would make it a point to be present at the prayer meet mg no matter at what sacrifice of other work

Besides Mahatmaji a cottage, in the eastern section of the Ashram there are a number of other cottages which stand at short distances from each other, and are occupied by other inmates. There are also a handweaving depart ment, a spinning department a cow shed and extensive agricultural lands, most of which were at the time given over to the cultivation of cotton.

On the western side of the road a spacious and imposing bollding which accommodates the school attached to the Ashram greets the eye of the traveller Along with the inacquiration of the non-co-operation movement, Mahatmaji had abolished the system of literary education till then prevailing at the school as he felt that that was not

The place for prayer meetings has since been changed, and it lies now on the north-east of Mahatmaji s cottage the time for young men to remain absorbed in acquiring book-learning He wanted everybody to take part in the righteous fight then going on throughout the country Some should forward the cause by applying their intelligence to its success, some by participating in active work, the boys must contribute their quota by the exercise of their hands and feet, working at the spinning wheel and the handloom Mahatmaji had in fact laid down specific duties for all, men and women, young and old, and it is precisely because he had succeeded in enlisting the active co-operation of people from the highest to the humblest that his movement had in such short space of time expanded to vast dimensions. The abolition of the literary system of instruction at the Ashram School was followed by a considerable fall in its numerical strength, but Mahatmaji did not mind it at all For in Mahatmaji's opinion it was no good for scholars to have an education which would not make men of them, which would not build up their moral backbone, and so make them strong enough when called upon to enter the lists on behalf of Truth and Justice

To the west of the school building stand Mahatmaji's Library, and the Boys' Dining Hall. In the western section of the Ashram there are other structures also but these have all grown up for the most part in close association with the school. For instance, to the north of the school are four rows of cottages in which about a dozen of the teachers live with their families. Further north and separated from all these is the cottage of Imam Saheb. Imam Saheb is an Arab Mussalman, who was once a trader in South Africa. He was one of Mahatmaji's helpers, when Mahatmaji launched his campaign of Passive Resistance in assertion of the honour and self respect of Indians in that part of the world. From that time onwards Imam Saheb has been one of Mahatmajl's companions. And Mahatmaji's principal object in bringing him over to India was to give a practical illustration of his belief that it was possible for Hindus and Muslims to live together in bonds of amity while remaining faithful to their respective creeds.

The eastern and western halves of the Ashram have grown up on the basis of a common ideal. Nevertheless there are differences of outlook which do not bowever make themselves felt. For these do not interfere with the system of daily work to which all have to conform equally This common programme of daily work and life has to be under stood a little closely and for this certain preliminary observations are necessary The body the mind and the the sonl-these three go to make a human being Ordinanly however we see that people who are anxlous for mental and moral culture either forget or neglect the needs of the body and give themselves up wholly to their studies or to their religious pursuits order to steer clear of this error every inmate of the Ashram is bound to do some form of bodily labour or other Even the teachers bere draw water from the wells and carry it in vessels suspended from a pole on the shoulder everyone has to wash his own clothes clean bis own plates, and do such other physical labour for himself As soon as the prayer bell rings at four in the early morning every one has to wake up and prepare to uttend the prayers. So too when the bell rings in the evening every inmate must be ready to come and join in the prayers. In respect of all these matters all who belong to the Ashram are bound by common rules of discipline But the high ideal of renunciation and self-restraint which Mahatmaji has in a unique measure reached in his own life, and which it has been his endeavour to place before the country at large through the discipline of Ashram life is one which can hardly be realised in their daily lives by ordinary men and women and especially those who are married and are householders Truth, Non-violence, Brahmacharya or self-control, the nonpossession of wealth except such as is absolutely necessary for self-support, etc., all these may be accepted as the goal of one's life but their realisation in thought, word and deed in one's own daily life could only be the result of a high degree of self-purification Mahatmaji himself knows this, and therefore he would not, either directly or indirectly, force any request on anybody to take up those vows through any formal process of imitation or any process indeed which would smack of outward display As far as I have seen, it is no part of Mahatmaji's system of training to force his views upon others, or to get anybody do a thing merely because he (Mahatmaji) considers the doing of it right and But his one anxiety is to strive untiringly to make his own life grow from more to more in purity and holiness, and he is quite pleased and happy if people should accept or carry out as much of his teaching as they can in a most natural way and out of their own initiative

THE ASHRAM PRAYER

At the sacred hour before suntise, the Ashram bell rings to rouse the inmates from their sleep. That ringing sound penetrates your ears and wakens your slumbering consciousness. But this call-is it merely a call to you to shake off the slumber of your body, or does it betoken also a call to awaken your slumbering soul? From every quarter of the Ashram are heard voices of awakened people and soon with rapid steps they are seen repairing to the place of prayer meeting where they all assemble at the proper time The Dawn is still fast asleep in the lap of Night her beloved maid of honour who protects her sleeping Queen from the world's gaze with her thousand flashing eyes. The keen rays of those eyes fill every quarter of the heavens. In front the sweet murmur of the running brook heard like an indistinct sound of music waited from afar through some unknown region breaks in upon the solemn stillness. On a sudden blending its harmony with this note of music, is heard the note of prayer uttered in chorus by a hundred throats

This morning I worship the Great Being Who is beyond the reach of Mind and Speech by whose favour the Eternal Sound receives its primal energy to whom the Vedas point by the words. Not this. Not this , Who is the Great Lord to whom all gods bow in reverence. Who is the Self-existent (uncreate). Immutable and Primal Being.

* प्रातर्भजामि मनसो षचसामगम्यम् । वाचो विमान्ति निक्षिला यदनुप्रहेण ॥ Then follow songs of praise in salutation to the Earth, to Saraswati, to the Guru, to Vishinu, and to Siva. Then, the devotee places at the Lotus Feet of his Lord the yearnings of his heart in the following terms—"I yearn not for earth, nor heaven, nor even freedom from rebirth, but my heart's yearning is to relieve the woes of suffering humanity. May the peoples be happy! May the rulers of the earth following the path of righteousness protect their peoples! May good ever attend the Cows and the Brahmans! May the whole world be happy!"

Lastly the devotees recite in chorus the following hymn of complete self-surrender to the Feet of the Lord —

"I bow to Thee, the Creative Energy I bow to Thee, the Spiritual Energy that sustains the whole of Creation I bow to Thee, the Great Being Who sets free all from the fetters of finite life I bow to Thee, the one all pervading Reality I bow to thee, the Omnipresent, Eternal Truth"

"Thou alone art our fittest refuge, Thou alone, the worthiest to be desired, Thou alone art the Revealer of created existences, Thou alone art Self-Revealed, Thou alone art Creator, Sustainer and Destroyer of all existence, Thou alone art beyond all limitation, Immutable, Transcendental" *

तं देवदेवमजमच्युतमग्हुरप्रथम्॥

" नमस्ते सते ते जगत्कारणाय । नमस्ते चिते सर्वछोकाश्रयाय ॥

After the scriptural part of the prayer is over the Ashram musician will teach you through his Bhajans *-O man you are not an isolated unit io this world standing apart from everything else bot you are vitally united with the whole Let it be your endeavour in a living manner to realise this oneness. You will have to purify your life through work and service to the world and when your life is purified should you be able to shake off the antagooism born of a separate selfish existence. For when this actaponism of spirit ceases, then truly do you become one with the whole world Therefore the Shustrast make a threefold division of action e.g. Satuk (altruistic or other regarding) Rajasik (or self regarding) and Tamasik (neither selfish nor unselfish but the prodoct of self-delusion) Therefore, try to realise the full significance of this teaching of the Shastras and while devoting yourself the whole of the day to work try to briog the same into comformity with that teaching No one remains without work even for one single moment. oor is it possible for him to do so Work olone would lift you god work also may lead you down to hell The good

The singing of devotional songs † Hindu ser ptures and the evil of diverse types of action have been explained to you. Let this teaching be imprinted on your mind, and let all your daily work conform to it.

Thus should you begin the day's work at the Ashram If you have any doubts, you may have them cleared up by the Acharya. It is your duty to equip your mind as efficient ly as you can, so that you may carry out the day's work with the necessary energy and strength of purpose

Again at the close of the day's work in the evening, is heard the summons for prayer You will hear again the sound of the prayer bell enjoining you to leave work. The sun has just sunk below the horizon lighting up the western sky with his crimson rays. The same river-bank, the same open sky, and the fresh gentle breeze of evening all appear to be anxious to co-operate in allaying your latigue after a heavy day's work. The joyous bouyant shouts of Ashram children are heard like the blended notes of birds repairing All on a sudden all sounds are hushed, and to then nests the loud chanting of a hymn of praise to the Almighty, is "He who is the Lord of the Universe, in whom all beard subsist, and without whom nothing can subsist, let all our heart's devotion and love be laid at His Feet O Lord1 to Thee Whose praises come forth in celestial strains from the lips of Brahma, Varuna, Indra, Rudra, Marut, Whose glories are sung by the Upanishads through the chanting of the Sama hymns! Whose Presence is realised by the followers of the yoga system through transcendent meditation on the Lord, and Whose infinitude is beyond the powers of Devas and Asuras to realise, -to Thee, O Lord! we bow our heads in adoration." After this will be recited in chorus in sweet musical tones some sacred verses from the scriptures These will teach you that if you seek to attain peace you will have to control your just for material enjoyment you will have to turn the course of your desires inward so that they may change their character and get spiritualised Iu the morning you were roused to throw yourself whole-heartedly into work and it was pointed out to you what type of work was truly conducive to your welfare. Now when you have finished your day a labour and are returning for rest, it is necessary to tell you that sleep alone cannot give you rest. For bodily rest is not the only kind of rest. During your day's work you have had to come under many external influences, and these must have affected your mind in diverse ways. If you can shake them off and so cleanse your spirit, then indeed will you be able to earn true rest. It is for you to place before yourself the high ideal of an active life in which while engaged in out ward work you nevertheless retain your equanimity of mind You will have to bring under your control the wayward passions and impulses lusting for outward gratification and steadily to develop the power of your inner self. Even as the waters of rivers find their resting place in the Great Ocean so also may the passions and impulses be turned away from their courses and made to enter the regions of the spirit within so that they may be transmuted into spiritual energies. Thus for him alone is true peace who has chained and spiritualised those desires of his which are seeking to find an external outlet through self indulgence He who lets himself be at the mercy of such outgoing desires and impulses for him indeed, there is no Peace.

It would be simply impossible to have a true insight

struggling towards self-expression in the shape of this Ashram, if we left out of our consideration these morning and evening prayers, devotions and teachings. Mahatmaji's genius for organisation and work has captured the imagination of the whole of India and has created in a universal awakening. His clarion call has been heard from one end of the country to the other. But if we seek to weigh and measure him merely by this external standard, we shall hardly be able to enter into the secret of his real greatness; we shall hardly be in a position to comprehend those spiritual forces of character which lie at the very root of the external manifestation of Mahatmaji's power and influence

FOUNDATIONS OF MAHATMAJI'S SPIRITUAL LIFE

Those who will have so far followed with appreciation the morning and evening prayers at the Ashram will be in a position to arrive at some understanding of the foundations of Mahatmaji s religious life. In the prayers there is a double note. First there is the note of emphasis on the doing of Satvik or altruistic work. But mere work, however un selfish—what would it lead to? What, in fact, is the ultimate objective the spiritual goal of such purified activities? That is the problem for all true aspirants. Therefore the prayers contain a second note pointing out that genuine work looses the chains of matter and leads ultimately to the emancipation of the spirit from the bondage of matter? I e sets the soul free. In that way is emphasised the high spiritual value of purified work as laying the very foundations of a truly religious life.

But the real problem for one who would seek to pursue a religious life is how he may keep his activities free from the taint of impurity. For a man may pursue a course of mere intellectual discussion of religious principles and doctrines, and yet if his thoughts and actions continue to be impure and selfish the attuiument of a religious life truly so-called, must remain a most remote contingency. It is therefore of paramount importance not to pursue at haphazard a life of mere strenuous activity but to work so that your work does not become a source of further bondage. The worker must indeed, from the beginning be trained to distinguish between good actions and bad,—trained to understand what sort of activities tends to enmesh you in a life of bondage and misery, and what other sort tends to lift you out of such a life

Mahatma Gandhi is a hero in the field of work, of work, that is to say, leading to the goal of such spiritual However much he might allow himself to get entangled in a thousand and one activities, his spiritual idealism never forsakes him. It is by the power of his spirit that he is able to keep himself free from their disturbing and contaminating influences, and he would pursue his course with a singleness of purpose, with a rare equanimity, and a unique power of self-conscious strength born of the power of spirit, even if he was left without a single worldly supporter That is why he was able to lift even political work on to the level of a religious calling. There is nothing in his politics which partakes of pretence, diplomacy, or hypocrisy His politics does not contemplate the attainment of political freedom with a view to serve the selfish interests of any particular individuals, classes or sects, to help in the growth of their selfish power, prestige or prosperity The ultimate objective of his political efforts, in fact, is to help forward a spirit of duty and service among Indians towards fellow Indians, irrespective of class or creed Those who mean by Swaraj the mere winning of political power, that is to say, the wresting from the hands of the English people the reins of government would find out that Mahatmaji would not remain satisfied with the mere winning For 1f after such political power had been once wrested by the efforts of any particular class or community, that class or community should become supreme and wield undue power and tyrannise over the general body of the people, Mahatmaji would be the foremost to resist such tyranny and deprive that class or community of its aothority. For himself Mahatmaji has no craving for riches, fame or power Mahatmaji sheart bleeds at the sight of afflicted poverty ridden Iodia. He has harnessed all his energies either to the mending or the ending of a system of government which has made all this possible. Therefore it is that his actions are so pure so spiritual so Satvik (altruistic) and so for him also politics has become the handmaid of a religious life.

Mahatman has accustomed himself to examine every single act of his in the light of its spiritual value and convert it into a dynamic element of higher life by the power of his spirituality. It is one outstanding ment of his that in the vas* majority of cases he hits the right mark when in judging actions in the light of their spiritual values he has to discriminate between the true and the false, the nure and the impure To live the life of the world and be bound op with its activities and yet tread the narrow straight path in the manner indicated is indeed an extremely difficult task And this is because on account of our personal likes and dislikes, over subtle cravings for enjoyment and our anxiety to gratify our personal will our vision of Truth is obscured and we get bewildered when trying to form a correct jodgmeot on the spiritual value of our activities. This is why many aspirants after spiritual perfection in the early stages live a life of seciusion from the world. But Mahatmall however does not approve of such a course When one of his own followers for a limited period of time

took to a life of seclusion for purposes of spiritual concentration, Mahatmaji told me that such seclusion was no good. By keeping away from the world, he said, we might indeed escape from the influences or the temptations of the world, but that would be only for a time. Therefore in his opinion, the one thing needful was to wrestle with those influences and temptations, and so gradually build up the power of controlling them. Not till then was our position at all secure, and so he summed up by saying that we must learn to acquire the power of keeping our heads cool and our minds calm, even in the midst of raging storms in a rough sea.

On another occasion he recited to me the following verses from the Gita, and said that, as explained therein, he could not understand why it should not be possible to go on praying within, while remaining engaged in external activities

"नैव किचित् करोमीति युक्तो मन्येत तत्त्ववित्। परयन् शृण्वन् सृग्गन् जिद्यन्नश्चन् गच्छन् स्वपन् श्वसन्॥ प्रलपन् विसृजन् गृह्वन्नुन्मिपन्निमिपन्नपि। इन्द्रियाणीन्द्रियार्थेषु वर्त्तन्त इति धारयन्॥"

Gita V. verses 8-0

[Translation —The man who is fixed on his inner self, and understands the truth of things regarding himself as doing nothing, but that only the several organs of sense are engaged in their corresponding activities, as when seeing, hearing, touching, smelling, eating, moving, sleeping, breathing, talking, throwing, taking, opening his eye-lids or closing them]

Thus Mahatmajl sets before himself a consistent plan of religious life in which work is trausformed into worship leading on ward to greater and greater self purification, and ultimately to the entire freeing of the soul from the bondage of the self or in other words to the attainment of an unending Peace He used to say that we must pursue our work with the energy and velocity of the Punjab Express but never losing our balance and our capacity to free our selves from it whenever necessary. In other words, we must preserve our sense of mastery remaining firm and unmoved spiritually calm and unaffected According to him that is no genuine work where the worker loses his equanimity and gets excited agitated or disturbed for he then loses his sense of mastery and the work loses its spiritual character and becomes a source of boudage and misery Those who have been going through this book from the beginning must have noticed many and various incidents Illustrature of Mahatmaji's patience and his wonderful power to preserve an unperturbed calm while all around was confusion and disorganisation. But I have had further opportunities since of coming into closer relationship with him and have obtained still more convincing proofs of the power of his. Even in the stormlest days of the Non co-operation agitation while the political sky was charged with cloud and thunder Mahatmali would pursue with perfect self composure his routine-work of conducting his two weeklies, Young India (in English) and Navajivan (in Guzarati) filling the whole of them with his own coutri butions Then again there was no limit to the number of letters and telegrams that used in those days daily to pour in from every part of the country and which demanded his immediate attention. In spite of all this, I have never seen him other than cool and collected. Those who have not seen it with their own eyes could hardly believe that it would be possible for Mahatmaji quietly to sit and get on with his work of writing out articles, etc., when all around thousands of people were roaring, shouting their joyous shouts and crying cries of victory (for Mahatma Gandhi)

That Mahatmaji is a great soul is apparent from what seen of the extra-ordinary qualities of his character Nevertheless, he has not yet succeeded in sundering the ties of self which bind him down to the body and a finite existence In other words, he has not yet reached the heights of the Freedom of the Spirit technically known in Hindu Scriptures as Mukti or Freedom from the bondage of Matter He has himself admitted it time and again One day in the course of a talk at the Ashram, he had expressed himself in the following way -"When once I should sit down and concentrate my whole self on the attainment of Mukti, then not till Mukti was attained should I ever rise from my seat" From what I have seen of his power of self-concentration, his self-control, and his unique mastery over his body and mind, I can very well believe unreservedly in what he thus declared about his own spiritual capacity It is not a matter of very uncommon experience to find men who would deny themselves many of their comforts and enjoyments, or who would go so far as to repress with an iron will the imperious cravings of the senses demanding indulgence and gratification But what is a very common experience about them is that their renunciation would hardly touch their character Their so-called renunciation instead of making them meak, humble and self-effacing would on the contrary make them uncommonly hanghty, arrogant and self assertive Even while renouncing some of their worldly pleasures, they would more than compensate for it hy an exaggerated self pride Mahatman s renunciation is far different from My impression about him is that most of the things that hold man in bondage, things internal as well as external, no longer have their hold on him. That to my mind is the only explanation of one striking fact in his public life. It is that notwithstanding the unquestioned hold which he has established over the hearts of unnumbered millions notwith standing the power, prestige name and fame which he enjoys and the command of wealth which is his one could not trace in him the least indication of self pride haughti ness or vanity. What all this means in the way of purity and cleansing of life could be properly appreciated only by those who by actual experience know what tremendous wrestling is involved in getting oneself free from the intoxication of name fame, wealth, power and things of that land

MAHATMAJI'S RELIGIOUS LIFE

The whole of Mahatmaji's life is indeed one long continued process of victorious self-discipline It is hard to imagine to what lengths of self-imposed discipline he must have gone in order to bring his body and mind in subjection and make them subservient to his will I have seen him undergo two long fasts extending over five days The fasts no doubt induced a great physical weakness, but as for his mind, it remained as strong as ever. The first two days of the fast, Mahatmaji used to say, were spent in some little suffering, but from the third day onward such suffering ceased, and his body enjoyed perfect restfulness, while inwardly his experience was that of an unalloyed, uninterrupted state of peace Even while fasting, the usual programme of writing for the two weeklies, or indeed of any of his other duties, e g, spinning, etc, would continue to be done with the utmost regularity and without the slightest break in any particular married, he had been leading a life of Brahmacharya or celibacy for many years past † Again by controlling his palate he has accustomed himself to giving his body only such kind and only so much of nourishment as are necessary for its support and maintenance For seven months on end, I have seen Mahatmaji subsisting on three meals a day

^{*} Those were during the period of seven months (1921-22) covered by this book

(morning noon and evening) each meal consisting of sixteen ounces of goat's milk three slices of toast, or an equivalent quantity of flour Bhakri * a score of grapes or raisins and a couple of oranges.

I have heard that before the days of Non co-operation Mahatmaji used to spend two hours every morning granding wheat ioto meal. He was so weak of body yet he was able to do so much physical labour merely because he was so stroog in will Till quite recently he used to travel only third class. At that period of his life he had to suffer much insult and ill treatment at the hands of fellow passengers Sometimes he would be taken as a cowherd and treated as such sometimes he would be mistaken for a Int ordinary cuitivator and turned out of his seat would submit to all this insult and hardship without disclosing his identity. One day a member of the Ashram said to me casually - You friends are non travelling in the company of Bapuil guite comfortably indeed. But there were days when he would carry his own luggage on his head and walk any distance from the station to reach his destination That of course is now impossible for Mahatmail has to give every moment of his time to the work of the nation But truth to say Mahatmaji would make oo distinction between the old style of travelling and the present. Rather if the question were not to him he woold perhaps tell you that in the old days he enjoyed his freedom of movement bot now travelling second class or by motor according to prescribed programme was not a little irksome comforts I do not think that anything could ever come from Mahatmaji which he did not truly believe in From my seven months' almost uninterrupted intercourse with him, I have come to believe that it is not possible for him to cherish any falsehood even in his dreams. But the question may very well be asked,—'How is it possible that Mahatmaji should suffer pain because he has to use things which are conducive to bodily comfort, and which, because they are pleasurable, are coveted by people at large?'' To elucidate this point it would be necessary for me to show how in all important matters of his life and activities, in his habits and manners, he differs from the vast majority and has chalked out an independent course for himself

This is by no means a display of false humility or an Bhakriis a kind of Guzarati bread

Thus, arriving at the Ashram, it did not take me long to notice that although he was its founder and presiding deity, he lived there as if he was no better than a guest, all his authority had been relegated to other hands. So if anybody came to him with a petition in connection with Ashram matters, he would reply that he was there as a guest, and it was not for him to exercise authority or grant any prayer Though born in a middle-class family, he had not kept any property for himself expenses of the Ashram were being defrayed by a number So many books or writings of his were being of friends sold in the market, and yet he would not exercise his right of proprietorship nor would he take anything from publishers in exercise of such right. In furtherance of Congress work, Mahatmaji had to undertake tours from one end of the country to the other, and yet he would not take a farthing from the All-India Tilak Swaraj Fund to defray his tour expenses. Towards keeping riches for personal use or enjoyment, his attitude was practically one of complete indifference or detachment. When Mahatmaji would return from a tour to the Ashram common people from the town or from the surrounding villages would come in throngs to have his Darshan and would offer him not ouly fruits and flowers as an act of worship but also coins of various amounts. That was a decent source of income to the Ashram for the daily collections went up to a high figure. But after a time finding that his work was suffering in this account, he directed that the offer of such presents should be problished.

Mahatmaji, as is well known has not renounced family and turned an ascetic he has throughout lived his life as a nouseholder with wife and children But even here there is something characteristic of the man. Thus while Mahat maji has never been found wanting in promoting all that s conducive to their true welfare still he could never oning himself down to the level of an ordinary man of the world whose one thought is how to serve the material nterests of his family I could never detect any the least discrimination made by him in his treatment of the members of his own family as against those who did not belong to it. Rather if anything it had appeared to me that towards his associates and followers he showed a greater consideration. It is this equal attitude and equal treatment towards all that has earned for Mahatmaji the hononred title of Bapu or Father In Guzarat he is hest known by the name Bapu Thus the right which his sons claim when they call him Bapu is no monopoly of theirs but is equally shared with them by the general public. All this becomes apparent when one has lived with him for some little time. Then it does not take long to discover that those who in the first instance sought to approach him on terms of equality would begin to address him as "Bapuji" not very long after

What ordinarily happens is that people take kindly to those who would speak well of them, and are repelled by those who would speak ill But in the case of Mahatman, I had so far observed a complete reversal of this rule panegyrist could ever hope to ingratiate himself with him A certain gentleman from Madras had written a book with its title as "The Gospel of Gandhi" When Mahatmaji saw that the word "gospel" was used as the title, he felt pained beyond measure. He told me that the use of the word with reference to his teachings was a direct insult to religion itself On another occasion, a certain article from a British newspaper tontaining eulogies of Mahatmaji had come to be reprinted in Young India Mahatman was then on tour, and he came to notice it only after the parti-This publication disturbed and cular issue was out distressed him beyond words. containing his eulogies and I found that eulogy gave him no pleasure but left him rather wan and dejected. But on the contrary, whenever any criticism or condemnation was read out to him he would listen to every word with rapt attention anxious to discover how much or how little of truth there might be in it. In the days of the Bombay riots * Mahatmaji was inundated with letters from the Pariss of Bombay both men and women containing the foulest abuse of him. I read ont everyone of these letters to him but I saw that such abuse made not the least impression on him for he remained as calm as ever. To be attacked in this foul manner, and yet to remain wholly unaffected by it—such self-control appeared to me at the time as something quite exceptional.

One thing that struck me as equally extraordinary was that those who opposed him received at his hands a measure of consideration honour and affectionate solicitude which he would not ordinarily extend even to the most devoted of his followers. Any enlogy pronounced on him or his qualifications or virtnes would leave him cold and indifferent, and that is all the gain which the panegyrist could expect at his hands for all his pains. Now it may well be granted that Mahatmaji is best wishes were un remittingly showered upon his devoted followers which went a great deal to purify and ennoble their lives. Never theless from all that I have seen my feeling is that as between opponents and friends his love and tenderness were reserved more for the former than for the latter.

For the humiliated and the oppressed, Mahatmaji's sympathy is deep and unstinted, and nowhere else could they expect anything like it. Mahatmaji's heart instinctively goes out to the person who has incurred everybody's displeasure. On one occasion, for some reason or other, many inmates of the Ashram were averse to accord consideration and attention to a certain person, whose ways and manners had become the subject of criticism in Ashram Mahatman also disapproved of the conduct of that But from the day that he came to discover that the Ashram public had become unkind, from that day onwards he made it a point, in spite of a thousand and other pressing duties every day to go and visit the person in question, who was soon reinstated in public favour Mahatmaji's psychology in matters like this is worth noting. Whenever he sees anybody under him behave untruthfully or do anything dishonestly. Mahatman's practice invariably is to examine himself in the first instance, to see wherein he himself might have erred holds that unless there was some lurking wrong or untruthfulness in his own character, people working in intimate touch with him could not be guilty of such wrong My honest belief as the result of my association with him at close quarters is that Mahatmaji's life is so transparent, clear, and pure that he has hardly anything to hide from public view

MAHATMAJI S SPIRITUAL DISCIPLINE

How exactly Mahatmaji should have been able to attain this lofty standard of purity and unaffected simpleness by pursuing what definite spiritual processes should he have succeeded in purging himself to such an extraordinary extent of the impurities and imperfections of ordinary human nature-is a question which occurs naturally to most aspirants after higher life. But here I am unable to posit anything definite for although I have lived with Mahatmail uninterruptedly for seven loog months night and day I do not pretend to have any special knowledge of his life a moer discipline except of course what could be gleaned from the outside. For Mahatmail was not given to discussing matters of such discipline That side the inner religious side of his life he seemed to be anxious to veil from public view as much as possible. Such at any rate is my conviction judging from all that I have seen of him But there is one thing about him which is most clear to me It is that he has an undying faith in Truth and the pursuit of Truth as a spiritual force and that for the sake of Truth there is nothing which Mahatmali cannot give up I have been led from this to hold that Mahatmaji's spiritual clean sing has followed as a natural effect,-the effect namely of the light of Truth constantly beating upon him and transmuting his life and character

Born of a Vaishnava family the instincts of a Vaishnava

are bred in his bones. His childhood, and, boyhood, having been passed in Guzarat where the teachings of Jainism hold sway over the minds of the people, he must have in no small measure come under the influence of such teachings in the most impressionable period of his life. During his stay in England and in South Africa, he came in contact with many religiously minded Christians, and under their influence studied the Bible and the teachings of Jesus Christ with profound respect. He has also associated with many devout Mussalmans Further he has a wonderful power of disentangling and seizing on the vital truths of every religion which has saved him from falling into the snares of sectarian ideas and the narrowness of sectarian feelings. In these days a copy of the Gita is always to be found with him, and the Gita has become his guide, friend and philosopher is like a necklace which he wears round his neck. He is an England returned barrister, and yet in many ways his habits and manners are those of a devout Hindu

Along with a copy of the Gita, Mahatmaji used to keep in his Khaddar bag a rosary of "Rudraksha" beads. But I had never seen him using it. During the critical days of the Non-co-operation movement, on two mornings going to remove his bedding, I found the rosary lying near his pillow, and I thought that he must have used it over night Again, in September (1921), when he met Mr Mukerji in Calcutta, Mahatmaji told him that when reciting God's name he used his rosary and it was shown by Mahatmaji to Mr. Mukerji, but that by actual experience he had found that if he went on taking God's name while turning the spinning wheel, that did him greater good than telling the beads, and that he had come to believe that if people took to the wheel as a religious discipline their minds would naturally turn towards God. Writing on the 'moral aspect of hand spinning in India in his Young India. Mahatmaji has given expression to the very same sent ments. Thus we find him writing as follows — And I verily believe that when millions take to it (the spinning wheel) as a sacrament, it will turn our faces godward. I know nothing in detail of the manner of his priying, but I have oftenumes seen him working away at the wheel with deep, one pointed attention and the thought lad come to me many a time that Mahatmaji probably practised the Ajapa§ mode of prayer. But whence or how he had learnt that system of prayer is more than I could say

I have placed before the reader just so much of the religious side of Mahatmaji's life as has directly come under my personal observation or as I have been able to comprehend. Various attempts are being made by various people to probe and estimate from various points of view his all sided greatness, and thus to arrive at an integral view of his distinctive personality. But I hold that it would never be possible to arrive at a synthetic understanding of Mahatmaji's character, so long as there is no deeper under standing and appreciation of the religious side of his life, that side which is ever welling up from both within him and without,—'within him' in his pure, ennobling, self-effacing thoughts, and 'without', in the shape of his daily disinterested acts and activities. Mahatmaji is very fond of a certain hymn composed by the great saint-poet of Guzarat, Narasaya. Very frequently at prayer-time, this hymn would be sung to him. When Mahatmaji was going to bid farewell to his beloved. Ashram after his arrest', it was the same hymn that he asked those that were there to sing to him. It would seem that Mahatmaji's whole soul breathes out through that hymn. It paints so fully the whole cast of his mind and the deepest longings of his spirit that I must give below the full text of the Guzarati original together with the translation.

It will be seen that this celebrated hymn of Narasaya praises the name of Ram. Once also when Mahatmaji after a whole days work and fast was feeling thoroughly exhausted I heard him heaving a heavy sigh and taking the name of the Lord thus—Shree Ram, Shree Ram † Further having regard to the reverential manner in which he speaks of Tulsidas s 'Ramsyan and listens to hymns in praise of 'Ram I have come definitely to believe that he recites the name of Ram, as an act of dwine worship

MAHATMAJI'S FAMILY

Just as everyone in the Ashram calls Mahatman by the honoured name of "Bapu" (Father), so also his wife is known as "Ba" 'Ba" in Guzarati means "Mother" As wife of Mahatma Gandhi her life has been one of severe testing Her husband is recognised as the greatest man of the world living, and accorded royal honours by the people of this country Therefore on her has devolved the responsibility appertaining to the position of the mother of 33 crores of India's children While she is no doubt the partner of her exalted husband's fame and glory, none of the pleasures and comforts of the world has been hers. For she shares with her husband a life of sacrifice and service, and in her devotion to the cause of the country and the general public, she follows in the steps of her great husband Never has she stood in the way of her husband his pursuit of a higher life, and whenever or whatever way it had become necessary for her to come to his assistance, that assistance she had extended to him by thought, word and deed Thus shall she find an honoured place on the roll of India's great women noted for their virtues and devotion to their husbands, and India will not willingly let her memory die

It is no easy matter to share with Mahatmaji his keen judgment of things, and "Ba" has been hard put to it on occasion to conform to Mahatmaji's high standard of such judgment. On one occasion a certain inmate of the Ashram was unwell but Ba had not kept herself informed of it So Mahatmaji felt it necessary to point out to her her lapse and be did it at the prayer meeting in the presence of everybody. If Devadas* had fallen ill you would have known of it long ago but how is it that you do not keep yourself informed when others fall ill? And on another day he said to me. I have from the first so trained. Ba that she never shrinks from any kind of work even down to the cleansing of water-closets. But when she feels thoroughly worn out by hard work she poor thing neither grumbles nor protests but simply weeps."

Mahatmail's kitchen at the Ashram is known as the ' Big Kitchen When he would be staying at the Ashram he would have every day many guests who would be served from the Big Kitchen Whenever friends or acquain tances came to see Mahatmail he would make it a point to invite them to be his guests and it became Bas duty to prepare food with her own hands for all the guests morning and afternoon. + When this went on for some length of time her health would visibly suffer and she would look a shrivelled figure. On the other hand I have often seen that when Mahatmail stayed away from the Ashram and she got some respite her strength would return and she would look as fresh as ever. Thus I observed that in her dally life and activities she followed her great husband's ways by cultivating habits of indifference to or disregard of worldly pleasures and comforts

Devadas is Mahatmaji s youngest son.

[†] The practice at the Ashram is to finish the evening meal before sundown.

therefore is a shining example of wifely devotion and service to the husband, which "Ba" is leaving behind her for all Indian women to follow

Of the four sons of Mahatmaji, only the youngest, Devadas, was at the time I am speaking of living at the Ashram. During our stay at Madras, Mahatmaji had casually mentioned to someone that after his return to the Ashram, he would have only Devadas and me by his side to serve him. That was the reason, I now saw, why Prabhudas had been told off to Wardha and Jamnadas to Rajkot, for other work. With those two I had become very intimate but I had now got to cultivate the acquaintance of Devadas. I was feeling a little uneasy at the prospect, but Prabhudas assured me that Devadas was so tenderhearted and obliging that it was no trouble to be friends with him.

I saw Devadas for the first time at the Alimedabad station Through the exuberance of his spirits, he was humming a tune, while he was also getting our luggage put in the motor lorry We drove to the Ashram in that lorry, and on the way, commenting on the speech of a certain well-known political leader, I heard him stigmatise it as mere "rigmarole" His vivacity, natural to a young man in the vigour of health, his keen intelligence, and his fine conversational powers cast a spell over me and trained by Mahatmaji himself as a boy, Devadas had imbibed many of his father's qualities Devadas's courtesy. and his readiness to oblige others, his fearless courage, and his cheerful and calm exterior seemed to me to be quite exceptional Mahatmaji himself had once remarked to me,-"There is not an iota of fear in Devadas's composition Where other people should think thrice before venturing at any place Devadas without the least hesitation would go and enter there. By slow imperceptible degrees niknown even to Devadas himself. Mahatmaji had been trying to develop Devadas a character and make him imbibe the high moral principles and ideals for which the Ashram stands. And it did not take me long to see that as Devadas grew in years he would acquire such knowledge experience and maturity of indigment as would make him fit to play an important part as one of Mahatmaji's most efficient instruments.

I must now tell something of several young men ardent lovers of their country who though not Mahatman s own sons still formed a brother hood with Mahatman s children and like them had their meals in Mahatman's Big Kitchen While Devadas was remarkable for the charm of his conversation and for the ease with which he could make friends with others there was Chhotalalii, the quiet strenuous worker who represented just the opposite type of character. You might ply him as much as you liked with questions but you would hardly get out of him an answer His reserve and habit of silent work are such that his very presence at the Ashram could hardly be noticed But just as the silent working of the life-breath would keep the body functioning so also Chhotalal sunremit ing albeit silent, supervision of Ashram life and his anobtrusive efforts to maintain Ashram discipline acted even like the vital breath for the body politic of the Ashram and preserved its life and individuality. Mahatmail was wont to say- Chhotalal is a sipahi Le a soldier. In truth the only thing that attracted Chhotalalli was his own duties for every thing else he had supreme indifference,—so much so, indeed, that if the world were to go to pieces, Chhotalalii would not forget to be present at the post of duty at the appointed hour, as though nothing was the matter

"Surendiali," again, was a different type of character He had not the gifts of Chhotalali, but he would capture you by his charm of manner, his courtesy, his gentlemanliness, and his passion for philosophic discussion an ever-beaming countenance and was ever ready to serve his friends But even so, his passion for the acquisition of philosophic lore was so strong in him that under no circumstances could he restrain himself from indulging in it Therefore, there was no end to his questionings, and he found it hard, indeed, at times to give himself heart and soul, and in a spirit of austere devotion, to any prescribed duty Nevertheless his extraordinary power of ingratiating himself with others and making friends of them, had stood him in good stead indeed, for he had, at such an early age as his acquired a working knowledge of Urdu, Marathi, Guzarati, etc., besides a mastery of his own vernacular, Hındı

Then, there was a third youngman by name "Pyeralalji" Judged from the outside he looked as grave and reserved as Chhotalalji But Pyeralalji would let himself go if only you could strike a responsive chord in his heart, e.g., by starting a discussion on some high topic of intellectual interest. Pyeralalji had received his higher English education at the Punjab University of which he was a graduate. Mahatmaji would speak of him as a "scholai" when introducing him to others. When Mahatmaji had to look up his own writings or speeches, he would specially

depute Pveralalji Mahatmaji was wont to remark that Pyeralal was a veritable "Encyclopaedia of all his published writings and speeches

The youngest of these spiritual sons of Mahatmaji was Balknishna more familiarly known as Bakoba. An artist by temperament Bakoba lived to drown himself in the delights of musle. When he would sing the sweetness and softness of his voice would charm every hearer. You see Balkrishna and you are at once reminded of the Brahmachary youths of old living in hermlinges with their Rishi parents in forest glades. As befitting a true artist his nature yet retained its original linocence and simplicity. Nor was there anything to show that Bakoba was in danger of losing his unsophisticatedness with the growth of years as ordinarly happened to youthful people.

There is not the least doubt that Mahatmaji was ever watchful of the good of every member of his household—his wife, his sous and those others who were intimately associated with him. Nevertheless I noticed that for Manu his five year old grand-daughter and for Lakshml his seven year old foster-daughter his feellings were of the tenderest and it seemed to me that with them he had a real bond of union. The imperturbable gravity of Mahatmaji's demeanour led me on occasions to think that nothing on earth could relax him, and that he stood like a rock calm and immovable. But even when Mahatmaji was in his mood of high strung seventy. Manu and Lakshmi would come and engage him, and his features would relax and he no longer retained his unbending manner.

Lakshmi comes of a family of untouchables and her story connected as it is with the problem of untouchability

on whose solution Mahatmaji has set his whole heart has naturally acquired a special prominence throughout the country She has her parents still alive, and still Mahatmaji has been bringing her up as a foster-daughter. The advent of the untouchable girl in Mahatmaji's family as a member was too much of a shock to the domestic circle, and for a time it created a spirit of revolt against Mahatmaji Mahatmaji was quite prepared to renounce family kindred, and all for the sake of the untouchable girl He looked at her as for him the representative of the untouchable popu-Mahatman therefore felt that his attitude lation of India, towards Lakshmi, and his treatment of her, must serve as an object-lesson to all of his close identification and sympathy with the down-trodden race of untouchables in India

There has been a good deal of conflicting views in the country as to what exactly was Mahatmaji's intention when he spoke of removal of untouchability. There are some who believe that by raising the cry, Mahatmaji wanted at heart to lay the are at the very root of the system of caste in But there are others who hold differently, and take it as nothing else than as a mere diplomatic cry, to serve not a social but a political purpose Before the advent of Mahatmaji into the Indian political arena, there were social reformers who wanted to destroy the system of caste, these naturally fell into the error of imagining that Mahatmaji when he launched his campaign against untouchability must have had the same object as theirs in view that for Mahatmaji the removal of untouchability has nothing to do with the initiation of any changes in the existing system of dining and marriage among the Hindus reader must be aware of the views expressed by Mahatmaji on this very subject at Tinnevelly to a leader of the un toochable community Then again the reader might re member that when he returned to the Ashram after his All Iodia tour and Mr Rajagopalachary had pot him the very same question Mahatmali had similarly expressed himself against interference with the existing social rules regarding inter caste dining and inter caste marriages. At Delhi a little before the time we are speaking of an inter caste dinner had been held with great eclat through the initiative of a Depressed Classes Mission and under the auspices of the Arya Samaj In reference to this when letters from orthodox Hindus began to pour in I thought itmy duty to place the matter before Mahatmaji and I found that he was grieved and disappointed that people should have come to believe that he had identified himself with the movement in favour of inter-dining and inter marriage. He said to me - If people should persist in distorting my views in the mauner they are doing I am helpless later oo at the time of the Ahmedabad Congress a similar inter caste dinoer was held and when letters of protest from representatives of the Hindu community from different parts of the country begue to reach him I had again to place the matter before him. His reply was that neither had he been consulted abnot the dinner oor had he attend ed it. Bot he also told me that his information was that at the dinoer only food fried in gliee was served which according to Guzarati custom was not objectionable

I have observed that rules regarding eating etc., such as obtains among the more orthodox Hindus are not strictly followed at the Ashram Bot whether they are in consonance with local customs prevailing in Guzarat, or whether they are at variance, and if so, to what extent, I am not in a position definitely to say. I have, however, marked that Mahatman is in agreement with the strictly orthodox class of Hindus in commending the system of "self-cooking," i.e., eating food cooked by one's own hands as being superior to eating food cooked by other's hands. Therefore when any of the Ashram inmates had to stay away from the Ashram on some business or other Mahatmaji would have them cook their own food. But at the Ashram itself, since all had to submit to a common code of conduct and follow a common ideal, Mahatmaji thought that that rule might, without detriment, be kept in abeyance matter of his own, food, I have observed him following the orthodox rule of Uchhista * He accepts the scriptural rule about the purity of your food as an aid to the purity of your mind. But he holds equally strongly that if your object be not spiritual, if your object be not to keep the mind pure, but on the contrary, if the object is merely the assertion of your superiority (in point of birth) as against the lower-born castes, then the observance of restrictions in the matter of food and drink, however much it might wear an air of religious authority, is irreligious at the core. On the other hand, Vahatman holds with the whole strength of his heart that the ideal of self-restraint and self-discipline, which is at the foundation of the whole of the Hindu system must be maintained at all costs Therefore, if anything happened

The rule is that you must not eat the leavings or the remains of another's meal, that is to say,—any food which has partly been partaken of by another, nor any food which has come in contact with such food. From which it follows that you cannot eat off a common plate with others to loosen its, hold on the Hindu mind there would be nobody I imagine who would feel the situation so acutely as Mahatmaji. Therefore holding as Mahatmaji does, that the system of self restraint and self-discipline which forms the corner stone of the Hindu social structure must be kept unimpaired and undiminished—he has never cherished any thought of destroying the system of the four fold caste. Nor has he for the very same reason supported inter caste dinners and inter caste marriages as appropriate measures of social reform.

THE FIRST THREE DAYS AT THE ASHRAM

The best part of the last two months had been spent in the company of Mahatmaji in railway trains in travelling, or making halts, now at one city, now at another, then at a third, and so on in rapid succession Now having arrived at the Ashram and breathing its larger air I began to feel how very narrowing and cramping had been the influence of that life in trains on my spirits. Here I felt the invigorating breath of life and my spirits revived. On all sides stretching into the far distance was a vast, open plain, and the soft breeze unpolluted by the dirt and filth of the city acted like a balm Even like a long imprisoned bird just released, I began to breathe more freely and gave myself up to the joys of my new-found liberty The moment I set foot in the Ashram, dear friend Surendraji came and welcomed me and took me to his room, and assumed the role of my guardian, ministering to my personal wants and comforts After having obtained from him an idea of the things and objects in the Ashram worth seeing, I was wandering about, when I came upon Mahatmaji returning On seeing me he asked in Hindi how I from his bath liked the Ashram, to which I replied, "Jagah bahut achha hai" (the place is very good, indeed) He was very glad to hear this, and emphasised my view by saying, "Bahut achhi Jagah hai", with a special stress on "bahut" (very), and then I then understood that I had murdered Hindi left.

grammar by using achha (masculine) instead of achha (feminine) before 'Jagah (place)

On the day we arrived (6th October) the Ashram prayer meeting was held with great eclat. Besides the usual congregation consisting of the inmates of the Ashram, there was a large gathering of people from the city itself (Ahmedabad) who had come to join in that days prayers. At the conclusion of the prayer meeting a report was read out of the amount of yarn spun and cloth woven by the inmates in the course of their days work. Mahatmaji followed the report with close attention. Then he discoursed in Gnjarati at considerable length oo the spinning wheel and the hand loom and finished by explaining at some length how the work of the movement was to be carried on in the event of his arrest. To all this the audience listened with eager and breathless attention.

The evening was a little too advanced and a fall of darkness was hanging round when the prayer assembly dispersed Mahatmaji returned to his room from the prayer but sallied out again for a ramble with a bamboo stick about three cubits loog in his hand. He was walking fast, and the night was dark so Devadas followed him with hurned steps with a lantern in hand. I was observing that there had been a greater air of cheerfuloess about Mahatmaji since his return to the Ashram.

None has any definite duties to do at the Ashram after the evening prayer. Everybody has to eat his last meal before the sun went down and then join the prayer Seeing that Mahatmaji had left for his stroll I repaired to Surendraji's cottage for the night. The bell again, rang out at four in the early morning and the immates assem bled again at the prayer meeting and began chanting in chorus the hymns. When this was over, Mahatmaji spoke a few words of exhortation on the need for cultivating a spirit of loneliness for purposes of self-realisation. He explained that such loneliness could not be had merely by retiring into forest glades. But if we could detach ourselves in spirit from worldly attractions, then indeed could we hope to feel and realise a real loneliness, even though we might be living and moving among men. Not being able to understand Gujarati well enough, I tried as best I could to follow the trend of Mahatmaji's teachings with such intelligent insight as I was capable of I was beginning to feel how very inconvenient it was to have thus to depend upon my unaided powers.

It was quite a' task to keep Mahatman's records, correspondence and other papers so arranged that there should be no difficulty in finding them whenever wanted. Tamnadas having left for Rajkot, I wanted to know definitely about my duties, and so in the morning of the 7th October, I approached Mahatmaji for instructions He said, "I will first speak to Devadas, and then divide the work between you two" On the second day, there arrived guests at the Ashram, Mr Stokes from Bombay, Mr Jairamdas of Sindh, and Mr Ramachandra Rao of the Andhra country, and some others The skill and promptitude with which Devadas discharged the duties of hospitality simply charmed me. Mr Rao had a question to put He said to Mahatman,-"In the Gita, Shree Krishna enjoined Arjuna to go and fight with his opponents, while you are preaching a nonviolent fight. Is there a way of reconciling these two attitudes?" Mahatmaji simply said,—"This is a question often put to me, and I have answered it many a time Devadas will tell you all about it. He knows. After a short while, however, be himself explained the matter briefly thus: The Gita is really a philosophical work. Deep down in man's nature is a war going on it is the higher and the lower in man perpetually battling for mastery. The Gita only gives in the form of a story the exhortation of the Uni versal Soul (Paramatman) to the Individual Soul (Jivatman) to fight and destroy the lower life and thus to establish the ascendency of the higher or the spiritual element to assert the supremacy of the soul life of man " On another oc casion some other person put to him a similar question as follows -"You consider it a sin to hill but it was Gurn Govind Singh, the tenth Sikh Gurn who organised the Sikhs into a community for merely fighting purposes If so must it be said that the tenth Guru put a premium on Adharma or irreligion? Mahatmaji answered thus -"The privilege which rightly belongs to a highly developed soul like Guru Govind Singh must not be claimed by us ordinary mortals. If we must follow in his steps we must in the first instance seek to realise his high level of spiritual ity " What I understood from Mahatmaji s brief answer was as follows —

In Mahatmaji s opinion ordinary men and women standing as they do on the lower levels of spirituality must in every single act of theirs try to discriminate between the rightness and the wrongness of that act and then eschew the wrongful act. Otherwise by the doing of sunful acts the inner life of man would grow more and more impure while at the same time the results of such impurity would be seen m pain and suffering. When bowever the heart of any spiritual aspirant gets thoroughly purified of evil, the power of evil no longer holds him in bondage. Therefore the taint of evil having gone out of him, he is incapable of harbouring any evil thought or feeling, and, consequently, he becomes incapable of doing any act with an evil intent. Therefore, conversely, no action done by him could possibly affect his heart or mind evilly. Hence, it is clear that the rule of judgment which must hold good in the case of ordinary mortals whose hearts are impure and who live impure lives and who have therefore to be purified of evil must not be made applicable in the case of exalted souls whose hearts have already been purged of evil."

The next day as usual there was the evening prayer. After it was over Mahatmaji calling out names made friendly enquiries of each inmate of the Ashram present of conversation, he made such humorous hits that he set the whole audience in a roar of laughter. Then instead of delivering any exhortation himself, he requested Mr Stokes to deliver a sermon "Thus the prayer-meeting was over, and he went out for a stroll as on the previous evening Then, in the early morning of the 8th October, the third day of our stay, a well-known Bengali song composed by the Poet Rabindra Nath Tagore was sung in course of the prayer The song had an enthralling effect on the audience, and even after the singing was over, Mahatmaji continued to remain motionless in his seat, and it was only after some time had elapsed that he rose, and with slow steps walked to his room without delivering his sermon. He would not want to interfere, with the deep spiritual effect of the song by any words of exhortation of his

and took my scat near him. His first words were that everyday and for a fixed period. I must make it a rule to spin. Then he said that it was necessary also to practise carding cotton which I should do at spare times. Here "Ba brought in Mahatmail's breakfast and as he went on suppling his milk he asked me to read out to him a couple of articles contributed by Mr Stokes to the Independent newspaper They were going to be published in book form, and it was Mr Stokes desire that Mahatmaji should write a Toreword to it The breakfast over Mahatmaji was going to write it, when Miss Anasuya Ben entered with an English gentleman from the City This gentleman was private tutor to the children of Mr Ambalal Sarabhai Cotton Mill-owner of Ahmedabad and brother of Miss Anasnya Ben After a short talk with him Mahatmani deputed me to show him round the Ashram The gentleman was so nice, simple and quiet that I easily felt drawn towards him. He also was pleased with me and asked what I was I am one of Mahatman s humble attendants -was my reply He then brought out his Kodak from his pocket and took snapshots of different parts of the Ashram Returning he approached Mahatmaji for permission to take a snapshot of him also Mahatmaji said - If you ask for my permission I can t give it because I have definitely made up my mind not to give a sitting But I will not prevent you from taking a snapshot of me if you so desire provided you do it without attracting my notice or interfering with my work Mahatman then resumed his writing and the gentleman took his snapshot.

A certain photographer of Bombay was present there at the time who having heard all that Mahatman was saying did not leave the Ashram as he had intended, but stayed for a few days taking photos of Mahatmaji in his various postures. Finding that the gentleman was so persistent in his efforts, Mahatmaji one day told him with a laugh,-"I tell you, you can't take an exact likeness of me, in fact, nobody has so far succeeded in reproducing my figure. My form is never constant, it undergoes various transformations in the course of the day " The meaning of this was not clear to me at the time. But since then having lived with Mahatmaji uninterruptedly a long time I have come to observe that his appearance does not indeed continue the same at all times Sometimes he has appeared to me like a youngman of twenty-five, pursuing his work with infinite and indomitable effergy. At other times, again, his look has been that of an octogenarian, a shrivelled figure, bent with the weight of years. What is at the bottom of all these fluctuations, I cannot definitely say. But I guess that the particles of his body may have become so pure and so shorn of grossness as to lend themselves to ready changes in response to the changes of feeling within. It is as though his body has become a perfect mirror reflecting the feelings of his heart

At 10 O'clock on the morning of 7th October, Lala Lajpat Rai and Mr Vithalbhai Patel (the elder Patel) called on Mahatmaji, and had a discussion with him about the likelihood of Government arresting him. Mahatmaji said that the only thing that stood in the way of the Government arresting him was their fear of forfeiting the sympathies and support of the Moderates and so they were hesitating Lalaji and Mr Patel, however, would not accept that view. It seemed that neither of these leaders reposed the least confidence in the constancy of the Moderates. Mahatmaji however, continued to stress his view of the matter. Lalaji said that the signs of fearlessness which were visible in the country everywhere and which were due solely to the example of Mahatmaji explained the hesitancy of the Government Lalaji having then expressed his desire to discuss something with Mahatmaji in private I came away

That day Lalaji and Mr Patel both dined at the Ashram There were a number of mischievous dogs at the Ashram They made it impossible for any one to eat his meal in peace. So when Lalaji sat down to lunch Mahatmaji stood there preventing the dogs from coming near During his last tour round the country I was an eyewitness of the homage and almost royal honours paid to Mahatmaji by people at large. And now when I saw him busily engaged in the task of driving away the Ashram dogs. I compared the pictures in my mind and to me it seemed that both were equally appropriate.

In the course of the afternoon there came to visit Mahatmaji Mr Valji. Desai, the then Assistant Editor of Young India Swami Anand Assistant Editor of Gurarati Navajuvan, and several others all Mahatmajis co-workers. I was struck by Mahatmajis manner and the cordiality shown towards them all It became clear to me that work under him did not mean any sacrifice of independence or of self respect, or of individuality of character. Thus time rolled lazily away. I had done nothing worth doing in the course of the last three days, and a silent fear was beginning to creep into me. For although I was living with Mahatmaji I was apprehensive lest I should lose hold of my anchor, and drift along the stream of passing events.

TO BOMBAY AGAIN

Mahatmaji left for Bombay again on the night of Saturday, the 18th October. This time Devadas and I accompanied him as personal assistants. Devadas was to me an excellent teacher to whom I could speak out on any matter with absolutely no hesitation. He was quick and prompt in everything, and equally pleased if others did their work with equal promptitude. With Mahatmaji went also Lala Lajpat Rai, Mr. Rajagopalachary, Mr. Ramachandra Rao, and Mr. Mahadev. Desai. I passed the night in the train with Mr. Mahadev. For him, I felt, poetry had a real fascination. He kept me awake till midnight reading out various poems, and explaining their beauties. I listened with real pleasure, and although our conversation did not last long enough, yet methinks its sweet memory is not likely to pass away soon.

It was eleven next morning when we reached Bombay Shortly after we had arrived at our lodging, Mr Jinnah came in for an interview with Mahatmaji. He had fixed up the hour previously by a wire. Mahatmaji was wearing only his loin-cloth which did not reach down to the knee, the rest of his body being bare. Mr Jinnah was dressed in European fashion from head to foot. The two stood face to face and shook hands. Here a voice from behind was heard saying in low tones, "What a great contrast!" The interview was long and private at the conclusion of which Mr. linnah left.

At six in the evening a monster mass meeting was held near the Elphinstone mills I accompanied Devadas there Mahatmaji had previously arrived As soon as Mahatmaji had entered the place the entrance gate was closed, and there could be no entry for us. About a hundred thousand people had assembled and the difficulties of the volunteers in preserving order were tremendous, and could hardly be appreciated by people who had never had a hand in tackling such gatherings. It became impossible at times for the volunteers to keep their temper Both of us had platform tickets and were therefore entitled to seats on the dais but we were refused admittance. We should have been spared all trouble if Devadas only chose to disclose his identity. but he would not. He had modesty intelligence and forbearance and he took to the more dilatory method of arguing and remonstrating with the volunteers until he succeeded in securing admittance on the strength of his ticket alone Devadas s deliberate abstention from demanding preferential treatment as Mahatmaji's son awakened in me a feeling of genuine admiration for him We entered and saw io front of us, to the right of us to the left of us as far as eye could reach rows of people in never coding succession arranged in seml-circles. A little to the left of the platform was standing a hoge pile of foreign cloth. Mahatmaji proposed for the acceptance of the meeting the Resolution passed by the Working Committee only a few days before at Bombay (i.e. on the 5th October) calling upoo the soldiers the police and all other Government servants, to resum. He declared that by so doing he was there openly committing the very same offence for which the Ali Brothers were being then prosecuted," and he therefore, called upon the Government to arrest him. He declared also that those who seconded or supported that Resolution, or who by their presence at that meeting showed their sympathy with the Resolution should be placed under arrest.

Mahatmaji then made a special appeal to the public that there should be no secret preaching to troops to incite them to revolt. He declared that in this non-violent movement all secret conspiracy was ruled out as opposed to its very nature. The rule was, he said, that if you could not make an open declaration of your object, you were not entitled to go about and preach it in private.

In the Working Committee's Resolution, there was an appeal to those who would leave Government service to take to the spinningwheel, the handloom, and the business of Khaddar as a means of earning their livelihood. ferring to this part of the Resolution Mahatmaji declared his unalterable conviction that the wheel and the loom were capable of eradicating the grinding poverty of the millions Further more, spinning, weaving and Khaddar organisation throughout the country would afford ample opportunities for people to make an honourable living, that is to say, without having to sell their independence by accepting service under the Government Mahatmaji said that there was a good deal of truth in Maulana Mahomed Ali's statement that in the present struggle, non-co-operators had no need for bullets or gunpowder, the handspun yarn was their bullet, and the spinning wheel, their machine gun

* Vide Appendix

But the people had not taken to Khaddar with suffi cient zest and had not yet succeeded in putting a stop to the imports of foreign cloth Even while Mahatmaji was saying these words in mournful tones his eyes filled with tears and with moist eyes he went on thus - 'A year ago I said that Swara; coold be won in the course of this one year but the year is out and yet Swarar is not won. A year ago I placed before the country a definite programme of work it has not been properly carried oot. How am I to convince my people that this sort of partial folfilment would not take us to the goal? How shall I bring home to my lawyer brothers that Iodian law courts cannot give people the justice they stand in need of and that, therefore it is not proper to go nod appear beforesuch courts? I have not practised sufficient hardships and penances to carn for me the spiritual strength to make people grasp the truth of my statements. For lack of such strength I could not make college students feel in their heart of hearts the wrongness of continuing their studies in Government institutions Nor even to this city of Bombay have I succeeded in bringlog home to its men and women the need of a foll acceptance of the message of Khaddar To me personally this is a matter of the sorest grief But I must forbear dwelling upon this personal aspect of my suffering For I have still hopes of Swaraj within the allotted time if people should all whole heartedly take to the wheel and the haodioom and begin to produce their own Khaddar So loog as the spread of Khaddar in the country does not come up to the mark, I must not take upon myself the responsibility of starting mass Civil Disobedience I am but an ordinary mortal full of failings

God alone is free from error Nevertheless I have intelligence enough not to repeat the blunder which I committed in 1919 by starting Civil Disobedience without adequate preparations The practice of Civil Disobedience is a mode of wrestling, with whose arts and expedients, difficulties and intricacies, I am thoroughly conversant know that it is a weapon of irresistible power, but I know also its potency for mischief, if it could not be properly As long as the popular mind is not fully awakened to the need for following the non-violent path in their struggle for freedom, so long the exercise of Civil Disobedience must remain in abeyance. We have first of all to make sure how far there has been this awakening of the non-violent spirit among us, and how far also Hindu-Moslem Unity has gained in strength. But the way to have a clear perception of what progress the nation has been making in these two directions would be by ascertaining how far there has been a spread of the spinning wheel and of Khaddar among the general body of our When the spinning wheel has found a secure anchor in our hearts, there will be no longer any fear of people leaving the ways of peace for those of violence in the pursuit of Swaraj"

In the course of his speech Mahatmaji referred to the fact that there were so many people who shed tears of grief because they were unable to bear the sight of his appearing before them in loin-cloth. On this he remarked—"So far as I am concerned, I do not stand in need of the least bit of sympathy. But I have just returned from a visit to several districts in the Andhra province, where a terrible famine is raging. Some of their women, it has been reported to me unable to bear the pangs of hunger, have ended their lives and the lives of their children by drowning Soch is the heart rending coodition of our people. If this should strike a sympathetic chord in the hearts of us all and we all take to the spinning wheel and Khaddar them only should it be possible for me to give up my loin cloth and go back to my former dress. I am about to set fire to the yonder pile of foreign-cloth but there is also a fire raging within my breast—and the fire I am going to light is but an outer expression of the fire that is consuming me within Mahatmaji concluded his speech by a reference to Lokamanya Tilak in the following terms.—To appreciate the greatness of Lokamanya we need not ransack the pages of his Geeta Kahasya. He could sum' up Lokamanya so Geeta teachings in ooe seoteoce. Swaraj is our buth right. That ooe sentence of Lokamanya Tilak expressed the very heart of Lokamanya's teachings—of all that he lived for all that he struggled for. That however was bot the first half of the Tilak Geeta, and Mahatmaji wanted to supply the other half. It is that Swaraj is attainable only through the spinoung wheel. A combination of these two statements woold supply the root idea of the Tilak Geeta, i.e. of Swaraj Shastra.

The huge gathering was greatly moved when they looked at Mahatuniji's and countenance and his eyes suffus ed with tears and they sat still listening in mournful silence After Mahatuniji Lalaji rose and spoke in thundering tones. Those of our countrymen who by their voluntary co-operation with the Government were helping to strengthen the chains of political dependence and those again who would not, for the sake of Swaraj, consent to take to Khaddar as their wear,—to both of these two classes of our people Lalaji applied words of severe condemnation. Lalaji was followed by Maulana Azad Sobhani, and Babu Rajendra Prasad, the great Bihar leader. Both delivered powerful, inspiring speeches.

Soon after this, Mahatmaji set the pile of foreign cloth alight, and left. That huge mass burst into flames simultaneously with loud explosions of crackers. Devadas and I made our way out through the crowd as fast as we could, but still we could not come up with Mahatman So we took the tram, and it was late in the evening that we were able to reach our quarters, when Mahatman had already taken his Monday vow of silence. Then his bed was made, and he lay down, and began reading Poet Rabindranath Tagore's article "The Call of Truth", which had appeared in the month's issue of the Modern Review of Calcutta (October 1921) Then, there was another article, "Gandhi and Tagore" an the Calcutta Review, a copy of which had been left with Mahatmaji by Mrs Naidu and to which she had specially drawn his attention. This also Mahatmaji read, keeping awake far into the night

Nothing was now being heard about Mahatmaji's arrest, and I thought that nothing like that was going to happen in the near future. Since coming here, however, the rumour reached us that Mr. Setalvad, the Indian Member of the Executive Council of the Bombay Government, was opposed to Mahatmaji's arrest and was fighting against the Bombay Government. Another rumour that reached our ears was that the Government of India had asked for permission for his arrest from the higher authorities in England, and was awaiting the sanction of the Secretary of State

The next day (Monday, 10th October) was mostly spent by Mahatmah in writing an article under the caption in reply to the Poet, His work 'The Great Sentinel was being interrunted by the arrival of visitors, the most important of whom were Mrs. Naidu | Lala Laipat Rai and Mr. Khadilkar, the Mahratta leader. Each of them. took on a considerable portion of his time. When however his article was completed he gave it to me to read with instructions that I must try to find out if any points had been left unanswered. By way of enquiry, he wrote also the following - I hope you have read the Poet sarticle When I replied No" he was a little surprised 1 there fore hastened to tell him that this very article in its Benealt original had been read out previously by the Poet at a public meeting in Calcutta and I was aware of the Poet's main arguments and points of view. This satisfied him Mahat maji a reply contained an exposition of some of his inmost sentiments and convictions in language which deeply touch ed my heart. It was not for me to pass any judgment one was or another upon his articles nevertheless on one or two previous occasions I had had to criticise him hot that was only because I had to obey him. In this case, however, I had absolutely nothing to say By my cheerfulness and by my gestures however I could easily convey to him my feelings about the article which appeared to me to be flaw less. Then he directed me to send the article to the post, and gave me also some Notes for Young India to be sent dong with the former Almost the whole day I had been with him and yet I had not noticed when he had made time to pen those "Notes" His power of rapid composition took me by surprise

The same day Mi. Mahades left for Allahabad Before he left, Mahatmaji had sent for him, and asked him a number of questions in writing. Mr. Jamnalal Bajaj also was to leave for Cawnpore by the 10 P. M. train. He came at 6-30 P. M. to take leave of Mahatmaji, and at the time of leaving told me that I must not neglect to keep him informed by wire or by post about happenings. Mr. Rajagopalachary also left for Madras the same evening.

The whole of Tuesday (11th October) till 10 P M was spent in Bombay Then we left for Surat by train. Maulana Azad Sobhani accompanied Mahatmaji Therewere only two minutes left for the train to start when we reached the Grant Road Station (Bombay) Devadas hurried away to purchase the tickets. I put all the luggage on the head of a porter except such small articles as I could manage with my own hands. At this Mahatmaji stretched out both hands and said, "Give me also something to carry." offering to relieve me But I would not allow him to carry any luggage He, however, kept following me, watching if in the hurry I should leave anything behind, or if I should require any assistance to put the things in the train Devadas and I together managed to do the whole work quickly enough, and so he had not to come to our assistance But his eagerness to help us was really very touching 1 now got into a third class compartment, but it was so very crowded that there was no sitting room and I kept standing One of the passengers seeing me in that plight came forward with the offer that I might use his bed in the upper bunk Afterwards Devadas came in search of me with my bedding on his shoulder, but I was asleep and he went away without disturbing me. The more I came to see of Devadas the more attracted I was feeling towards him on account of his manifold virtues

CHAPTER XII SURAT

Before it was sunrise on the morning of Wednesday the 12th October, we reached Surat—It had been arranged that Mahatmaji should be first taken to a particular place in the vicinity of the station, where he was to take rest for some time So from the station, Mahatmaji proceeded thither escorted by a large throng of people—He would have his breakfast and would also finish some of his work—there, after which he was to be taken in procession through the city to the other end of it, a distance of some three miles, and was to be lodged at the "Swaraj Ashram" there—Devadas stayed behind to look after Mahatmaji, while I took charge of the luggage and made direct for the "Swaraj Ashram"

On my way, I saw that in honour of Mahatmaji's visit, the city had been decorated and made clean and tidy and that large bodies of people clad in Khaddar were wending their way to the station, group after group in regular succession. Devadas had already apprised me of the fact that nowhere else in India would Khaddar be found so largely in evidence as here at Surat. From the hurrying steps of the people and the gala dress which they wore, I was led to imagine that something out of the common was going to take place. But I noticed no signs of commotion or disorder. In Bengal, under similar circumstances, the people issuing out of their homes would have paraded the streets in bands, shouting, singing and playing music, and thrown the whole city into a state of delinous excatement. Here also the people were out in the streets in bands but they were going about noiselessly. Only one noticed on the roads drummers stationed at intervals, to proclaim by beat of drum the auspicious tidings of Mahatmaji's presence in the city.

While traversing the main thoroughfare of the city old historical associations began to crowd into my mind This is that great city thought I where the mighty Sourashtra* had incarnated itself and shone resplendent for centuries. There are cycles in the history of every country and these must leave in natural course their imprint on its breast. Thus Bombay born only the other day and not yet arrived at maturity now proudly walks the earth tower ing above Surat. But the present cycle will have its day and the power of modern Bombay sunk beneath the waves of time will then have passed into oblivion. So shall Surat reinvenated reappear bearing in her hands the banner of victory and of her ancient glory I could see from the train the old fort of Surat and its surrounding wall and most. I cannot tell on what different occasions, what invading armies had been beaten back by it. No one can tell hy what sad from of fate mother Earth has here become girdled by a double chain of iron. The result has been that a heavy weight now sits on Surat's bosom and Surat's ancient wall its most and fort still standing all have become idle currosities arresting only the passing gaze of the traveller At that time my imagination pictured before myself the railway line that ran by the wall of the fort of Surat as a ventable

The name Surat comes from the name Sourashtra of which itis but a corrupted form. chain of iron that had bound her body, and the large station itself as a huge block of stone weighing heavily on her bosom with its massive weight

Here at Surat the English when they first came into this country during the days of Moghul rule established themselves and built their first factory. Who could have dreamt 250 years ago that the descendants of the handful of English traders who were then living in that factory were destined in course of time to become the undisputed political masters of this vast continent of India? Just as it is not possible to conceive of a huge banyan tree coming out of a tiny banyan seed, so also the mind refuses to believe that there could possibly be any sort of connection between that tiny British establishment at Surat and the present mighty British Government of India. But it is part of God's dispensation that the impossible should be made possible, and the present instance was a case in point

I found at Surat one remarkable illustration of the survival of an old western fashion. I had it from Devadas that the English musical band of Surat enjoyed a great reputation on the Guzarat side of India. If any marriage had to be celebrated with eclat, the Surat band was an indispensable factor. The costume of these bandsmen is an exact replica of what one sees in pictures of fashionably dressed English gentlemen of the 16th and 17th centuries. There was the same tall hat, the same striped coat, multicoloured like what you find on the body of a Zebra, while the cut of the coat was what had obtained in England three centuries ago. Naturally, the thought crossed my mind that we, Indians, were in very truth a conservative people. For while style and fashion in the matter of dress.

have undergone and are undergoing continual transformation in England the Indian bandsmen of Snrat have been true to their traditions of dress, looking like living pictures of English people of the days of old Moghul rule

While I was recalling these historical associations connected with Englishmen in India the story of the sack of Surat by Sivail, the rising sun of Maharashtra came back to my memory. Thus with my mind filled with visions of the past and the future. I proceeded on my way and at length found myself at the Swara; Ashram This Ashram is known also as the ' Pattidar Boarding The Pattidars are a distinct community in Guzarat and it was with their support that the Ashram was maintained Forty young men were then undergoing their training for national service there The Ashram standing as it did in the midst of a grove of trees far from the bustle of the city made me feel as if I had arrived at some rural spot Not far from here was another Ashram known as the Anavil Boarding which is maintained by the Anavil community of Guzarati Brahmans. Mr Dayalii the head of the Anavil Boarding was also the President of the District Congress Committee of Surat, whose Secretary was Mr Kalvanii the Director of the Pattidar Boarding Mr Dayalii having gifted away his all to the Tilak Swarai Fund he had nothing to call his own and was now devoting humself heart and soul to the cause of the country. Under his able guidance and with the collaboration of whole hearted national workers headed by Mr Kalvanji the District of Surat had become a model centre of non-cooperation activities.

Some two or three hours after I had arrived at the Ashram

Mahatmaji came with Maulana Azad Sobhani and Devadas, escorted by a large company There was a spacious, wellkept hall in the Ashram known as the "Prarthana Mandir" or Prayer Hall There immediately after his arrival Mahatmaji betook himself. Then, opening his portfolio he began some writing work, and continued doing so for some time, after which he went out to a large Mussalman village on the outskirts of the city When a little before sunset I arrived with Devadas at a big mass-meeting that was being held on a bank of the river Tapti, I found that Mahatmaji had already returned from the village and was actually addressing the audience. It was a monster gathering of some fifty-thousand people. In whatever direction I cast my eyes, I could see only Khaddar caps and Khaddar shirts Never before had I seen such a vast assemblage of people clad only in Khaddar This factor lent to the meeting an air of such solemnity and sacredness as baffles description Though I could not fully understand Mahatmaji's speech, as it was in Guzarati, yet I could gather that he no longer favoured such mass-meetings He was more anxious that steps should be taken now to establish Khaddar centres in every village For so long as the masses did not give sufficient evidence of having that knowledge, that devotion, and that singleness of purpose which followed on a whole-hearted acceptance of his message of Khaddar, so long was it not possible for Mahatmaji to advance along the road to mass civil disobedience. Devadas and I returned to our quarters before the close of the meeting as we had to make preparations for our departure after, Mahatmaji and the Maulana Saheb arrived, and we started for Sabarmati that very night

PREPARING TO BID FAREWELL -I

Mahatmaji returned to the Ashram on the morning of the 13th October and stayed till the very end of the month Then he left for Delhi on the 1st November in order to attend the meetings of the All India Congress Working Committee and All India Congress Committee to be held there on the 3rd and the 4th respectively. These nineteen days (13 October -31 October) were days of seclusion passed at the Ashram. Nevertheless we shall find that the seclusion was not all seclusion, but that Mahatmajl had been planning schemes of action of far reaching Import For in those nincteen days were sown seeds of events which in time cave a new direction to the whole movement. The reader knows that on the 4th October, the All India leaders had met at Bombay and signed a Leaders Manifesto as it was called declaring the inherent right of everyone to express his opinion without restraint about the propriety or otherwise of citizens offering their services to or remaining in the employ of the Government, whether in the civil or the military department without being held guilty of tampering with the loyalty of soldiers or other Government servants. This Manifesto was published at Bombay on the 5th October Since then Mahatmaji had been working steadily towards Mass Civil Disobedience So arriving at the Ashram he began to utilise every opportunity of making clear to the members the underlying principles of civil disobedience and the goal to which it leads It was at this time, that Messrs Dayaljı and Kalyanji of Surat came to invite Mahatmajı to visit the Bardoli Taluqua, and informed him that in their opinion the Taluqua had acquired the necessary competance to launch on a campaign of mass civil disobedience was a very important circumstance as we shall see meantime, having resolved in his own mind that the time for coming to grips with the Government was rapidly approaching, Mahatmaji deemed it necessary gently to break to the fellow-workers and members of the Ashram that the hour for parting would soon arrive, and that therefore they must prepare for the final act of leave-taking Already he had conceived in his mind of a definite scheme for starting Civil Disobedience This he was going to place before the All-India Congress Committee at its coming session Delhi

In the meanwhile an unforeseen difficulty had presented Mr Vıjayaraghavacharı, the Venerable President of the Nagpur Congress (held in previous December) started the difficulty He enjoyed universal esteem for his intense devotion to the country's cause Advanced in years, he did not fall in with the Moderates, who favoured the policy of following the lead of the Government in matters political Nor was he an out-and-out supporter of Mahatmaji in advocating a policy of non-co-operation This was apparent This difference of outlook at the Nagpur Congress itself between him and the non-co-operating leaders began to The executive powers of manifest itself in various ways the Congress were entrusted in the first instance to the All-India Congress Committee (A I C C) when the Congress was not in session Then under the rules passed by the last preceding Congress a small Committee called the All India CongressWorkingCommittee which was to meet more frequ ently had been empowered to transact business as the Executive of the A.I C.C when the latter body was not in session. Now this Working Committee in the exercise of its powers as the executive of the A. I. C. C. had convened a meeting of the All India Congress Committee on the 4th November at Delhi Mr Vijayaraghavachari the Congress President, and ex oincio President of the A. I C C thought it his duty to veto the proposed A. I C C meeting This led to a keen controversy in the public press between him and Pandit Motilal Nohru the Secretary of the Congress as to the respective powers and privileges of the President and the Working Committee -a controversy which has become memorable in the annals of the Congress. While the controversy was going on a number of telegraphic messages having been received by Mahatman from the President. Mahatmail instructed me to send the same to Pandit Motilalii for his private information. It transpired afterwards that Pandit Motilalii had printed and circulated them among the members of the A. I. C. C. This was a matter of great regret to Mahatmaji who had never intended that a private correspondence should be made public in that way As early as 13th October Motifalji had apprised Mahatmaji of the President having vetoed the proposed meeting of the A.I C C To this Mahatmaji had wired briefly the reply- I suggest courteous ignoring President's word That was what ultimately resulted at the meeting of the A. I. C. C. in spite of the heated discussions and controversies over it in the public press. The President, Mr Vijavaraghavachari of course did not out in an appearance, but nothing untoward happened in consequence.

Meantime, Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya, had an interview with the Viceroy, Lord Reading, at Simla / He arrived at the Ashram on the 22nd October to have a consultation with Mahatmaji Lord Reading had arranged that the Prince of Wales should visit India and set foot on Indian soil at Bombay on 17th November (1921), and he was determined that at whatever cost the visit must be made an unqualified success The Viceroy had made up his mind that there should be a grand popular demonstration in favour of the Prince In Mahatmaji's opinion, and that of the Congress Executive, however the visit had a deep political object, and the Congress Working Committee was determined to frustrate Lord Reading's plans The Committee had accordingly definitely proclaimed by a Resolution' that "on the day of the landing of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, there should be a general hartal throughout India, and as to the effective boycott of any public welcome to His Royal Highness during his visit to the different cities of India, the Working Committee leaves the arrrangements in the hands of the respective Provincial Congress Committees" The reason for proposing to withhold the Indian peoples' welcome to his Royal Highness was no disloyalty to the Royal House or to the Throne This had been made clear by the AICC in the following Resolution passed at Bombay on 28th July, 1921 — "The All-India Congress Committee desires to place on record its opinion that India bears no sort of feeling against the person of His Royal Highness and that this advice to refrain from participating in or assisting in any welcome to His Royal Highness or any functions organised officially or otherwise in connection with this visit. - is tendered because the Committee regards the proposed visit as a political move and calculated to give strength and support to a system of Government that has resulted in a breach of faith with the Mussalmans of India and atrocious injustice to the people of India as during the Martial Law days in 1919 in the Puniab and a system that is designed to keep India as long as possible from her birth right of Swarai What, however weighed with Lord Reading in persisting to bring to India His Royal Highness in spite of the growing unrest and discontent brought to a head by the Non-co-operation movement and in spite of the declared opposition of most of the Local Governments and Administrations of India was his Lordship's hope and belief that what had happened in India in 1905 when the present King Emperor as Prince of Wales had visited this country could be repeated this time also in India. In other words it was his Lordship's hope and belief that the Prince's visit would awaken once again the inborn slumbering loyalty of the Indian masses, and that as a consequence the Indian millions forsaking Mahatma Gandhi and his non-co-operating Congress would flock to the standard of the British Government. Lord Reading however had ample opportunities of discovering in the course of the four or five weeks following upon the landing of the Prince at Bombay that the problem of tackling unrest and discontent in India was not to be so easily solved All that happened subsequently by means of negotiation to persuade Mahatma Gandhi and the non-co-operators towithdraw their opposition to a welcome to the Prince had their genesis, it appears to me, in this visit of Pandit Malaviya. This diplomatic effort however, failed, as will appear in another chapter.

These days of Mahatmaji's stay at the Ashram (13—31 October) were days clearly marked out, for they bring out the fact that events were marching steadily to a denouement. I therefore present in the form of a diary a narrative of Mahatmaji's thoughts, sentiments and work during this period of his Ashram life. It would show also the nature and extent of my connection with his daily life and activities. This Diary has been culled from the letters that I wrote to my teacher, Mr. Mukerji at the time, and, though every important incident or discourse might not have been entered, still, it would give a general idea of Mahatmaji's manner of life from day to day, and the ways of his thinking during the period in question.

13th October (1921)—I find him treating me with even greater kindness than before, since our return from Surat, the reason for which is not quite apparent to me. I, too, have begun like others to address him as 'Bapuji," and am solicitous even as a son, of his blessings. It is part of his exalted character not to distribute his favours on grounds of high and low as between man and man. As the fight is assuming more and more serious proportions, and the hour for employing the greatest weapon in the armoury of non-cooperators (mass civil disobedience) is drawing nearer and nearer, Mahatmaji seems to be developing a greater and greater reflectiveness, a greater and greater intentness of spirit. Every minnte to him is now precious not a single minnte could be spared for idle talk. I am simply astomished to see how hard he has been working. The trial of the Ali Brothers is proceeding at Karachi. Some of the people around Mahatmaji had been finding fault with them for their conduct in court and creating scenes. Mahatmaji however said in support of the Brothers that such conduct would have one good effect, namely that it would destroy the false prestige of the British Courts. But he took care also to emphasise that for him such conduct would have been impossible. For said he, In my case it would be like a lamb before the sacrificial post.

In his Young India Mahatmaji has been saying very hard things of the Government, perhaps to draw upon himself the vials of Governmental wrath. To me it seems that here there is the deep anguish of a distressed soul pining to lay his head on the sacrificial altar in order that he may be beheaded and the intended victim be set free by the oppressor

On another occasion speaking to a certain gentleman Mahatmaji expressed himself thus — I have heard that when once a serpent has bitten its victim it has emptied itself of its whole quota of venom So I am working to the end that the Government might bite me and ponr ont on my devoted head the whole of its venom and thus get freed from its poison

Another day Mahatmaji talked of himsa (violence) and the method of combating it. What is the root canse of himsa? If there was no pleasure in it none would indulge in it. When the tiger goes in pursuit of the lamb the latter flees for its life and in most cases wild beasts hunt innocent animals merely in a spirit of sport, or for the pleasure of the chase Granted that between the tiger and the lamb there is an inborn relationship of the "eaten and the eater." But if it were possible for lambs, whenever they came in sight of tigers, to meet tigers face to face without any fear in their hearts, then in no time could the latter be cured of their propensity to attack the former. This British Government in India is fully equipped with a whole armoury of weapons enabling it at any moment to launch a campaign of killing An opportunity for doing so ministers to its spirit of militarism, and it feels immensely pleased and The only way to put an end to or curb on, this propensity to fight would be for the people to cultivate a spirit of absolute fearlessness in its attitude towards the Government If this could be done, the pleasure derived by militarists from inflicting injury upon terrorised victims would no longer be felt Thus when the Government would no longer find scope for establishing its rule on the basis of organised violence, it would be bound to recognise that the only alternative left to it would be government according to the will of the people" I could now see why Mahatmaji is so much against secret violence also why the success of mass civil disobedience is dependent equally on non-violence and absolute fearlessness on the part of civil resisters It is fearlessness of the highest order that can withstand a hail of bullets without getting demoralised or without succumbing to the temptation of retaliating

One day a professor from the National University of Guzarat came and put the following question to Mahatmaji.-"Bapuji, I wonder what could have suggested to you the pian of offering resistance by way of non violence. The history of the world does not firmish a single instance of unarmed resistance of resistance without violence. From what events or experiences or from what book did you first derive the idea of a non violent mode of political warfare?"

Mahatmaji paused for a while and then made the following answer — It was in South Africa when that Pathan assaulted and stabbed me that the idea first struck me *

The Professor— That is very strange indeed! If one assaults me my instructive impulse would be to retailate and hit back. How is it possible to wish well of one who inflicts an injury ou me? My happiness would then lie in avenging the injury. How should it be possible to feel happy when I have to bear a load of pain in my bosom? I am the iord I am blessed †—such sentiments seem to be quite natural to a human being Mahatmaji gave a patient hearing to the Professor but his answer was brief — Yes you think so and that is because in you the ego is too strong. The ego in me is not so strong and my way of looking at the question is different.

On another day I heard him saying — I have been conserving all my josh The two words rosh and josh

This incident is worthy of special attention. It throws abundant light on that true meaning of the doctrine of non violent warfare as promulgated by Mahatma Gandhi. Secondly it affords evidence of the fact that it was from this time forward that be seriously thought about tackling the problem of Hindu-Moslem conflict.

† This is an English rendering of a scriptural statement in Sanskrit, wrongly interpreted hera by the Professor

In Hindi are used by Mahatmaji in two distinct senses. Rosh is what is ordinarily known as anger, it is a selfish instinct requiring control. But josh is a righteous form of energy called forth to defend truth and justice. The energy of rosh is generated in the hearts of selfish people when they find some selfish end of theirs thwarted. But the righteous form of energy, the energy of josh, is evolved in the hearts of unselfish people. They see a fight going on between truth and untruth and feel the call to defeat untruth and re-instal Truth."

accompained Mahatmaji to the Ashram from Bombay The Maulana has composed in Urdu a lengthy manifesto condemning the forced, conversion of Hindus by the Moplahs of Malabar during the recent Moplah rebellion. Mahatmaji has referred him to me to have it rendered into English Mahatmaji has given him to understand that there was no need to trouble about the matter as "Krishnadas would do it all right." The message is inordinately long, and, what is worse, written in high-flown Urdu. I can haidly find my way through the tangle of words and phrases, and I am confronted with the problem of how to extract the vital parts of the message and write them out simply and lucidly

Having been occupied with the Maulana Saheb's work, I have hardly had any opportunities to-day of going near Mahatmaji, I have peeped into his room, but have always found him surrounded by people, and always busy with his own work. About six o'clock, I was cleaning my plate after the evening meal, when Suiendraji came and informed me that I was wanted by Mahatmaji immediately, and he offered to do the cleaning for me. Thinking that there must be some work of special urgency for me. I made haste and soon presented myself before Mahatman when he handed to me a lengthy registered letter, and asked me to tell him its substance. The letter was from a Mussalman gentleman and was an eanest appeal to Mahatman to accept the Islamic faith. Mahatmaji's reply was short and as follows - He (Mahatmaji) is a seeker after Truth The acceptance of a certain view of religion as true is not the same as discovering the truth for himself. It is neccessary to strive unceasingly to discover the truth He (Mahat maji) believes that the truth is not so easily attainable as the Mussalman brother thinks it is He (Mahatmaii) is of opinion that it is not attainable merely by subscribing to the truth of any religious article in the manner in which the Mussalman brother has done. Then he gave me several other letters which were to be filed and said - Consider able arrears of work have got to be disposed of and I have much to dictate to you. When he was speaking to me I suspected that he was not all well and I enquired He said- 'Yes, there is some slight fever it is nothing much It will soon be off At intervals there were mainfestations of bodily pain which I could notice Just then the prayer bell rang out, and Mahatmaji rose and left for the prayer meeting. After the prayers a car came for him from the city and he drove away

I asked Devadas where he might be going with the fever on him. He is going to attend a meeting in the city—was the reply. So in spite of his fever he must attend the meeting. There is a lot of writing to be done by him to-morrow as he has told me but he is unwell. It is quite likely, therefore, that I shall have to be by his side the whole of tomorrow But I shall also have to finish the Maulana Saheb's work, and my clothes have all got dirty I shall have also to wash them with soap myself, according to the practice in the Ashram. There are neither servants nor washermen here writing The Maulana Saheb sent me a reminder early in the morning for his paper, but he does not know that I do not possess the knack of rapid composition. At noon Mahatmaji sent for me, and I was engaged with him till evening, writing letters, telegrams etc. Apparently the fever has left him, as appears from his freer manner today. This is October, but even, now there are some indications of the approach of winter cold. I hear that winter in Ahmedabad is severer than in Bengal.

To-day I heard Mahatmaji telling some one -"The Gujaratis by their trade have been draining away Bengali wealth By so doing they are accumulating a great sin" The Bengalis lacking the commercial instinct, the Gujaratis have been steadily gaining predominance in Bengal in the field of trade and commerce This state of things, it appeared to me, was not to Mahatmaji's liking. On another occasion Mahatmaji said to some one-"There are people who think I did not do the right thing when I gave up my But what should it have availed me, practice as a barrister if I continued practising as a barrister? I should have lost my health, and into the bargain I should have created an army of dependents living on my charity. But having adopted the present mode of my life, I find that not a single member of the Gandhi family has turned an idler or a loafer Every one is skilled in some kind of work or other So even considering the matter from a purely business point of view there has been profit, and no loss.

roth October —I was fully occupied with work of various kinds the whole of yesterday nevertheless I have been feeling rather louely and dejected. Here in this un familiar land far away from my own people and yet with people surrounding me on every side. I um feeling as if I was living a life of loneliness. Mahatmaji s plan it seems is to go on heaping work on work so that the mind might not wander about for want of occupation. He believes that an effectual curb could be put upon one s mind if one is set to do spinning work on the charka. Mahatmaji is convinced that those who desire to ennoble and purify their lives would do well to take to spinning as a spiritual exercise. They would then discover for themselves that it is possible to gain therefrom a great deal of good in the way of mind-control and self punification.

From to-day a new system comes into being in our Big kitchen Pyarilalji Surendraji and Bakoba will henceforth cook each for himself and not have their meals from the Big Kitchen. They will have also to do spinning and weaving for the best part of the day. Mahatmaji is going to decide whether the country is ripe for civil disobedience by taking note of the spread of the spinning wheel and the handloom and he wishes his own family to carry out the system that he wants the whole country to follow. He sent for me last evening and said 'you must help 'Ba (Mrs. Gandhi) in the kitchen work as far as you can otherwise she would hardly be able to cope with it. I replied that I was ready to do my best. He then enquired

if I was doing my spinning regularly, and if my, health was all right &c

Mahatmaji is not now (afternoon) at the Ashram He has gone to attend a meeting of the Gujarat National College, and I am free These days I have ceased to report his speeches as he always addresses the audience in Gujarati, which I cannot quite follow Nor is there any real need for me to accompany Mahatmaji to meetings. Here he is in the midst of his own people, and there are so many eager and anxious to do his bidding. Devadas and I are not therefore called upon now to be in attendance upon him whenever he goes out. Ever since I have been here I find that almost every evening after prayers he has been going to the city to attend some meeting or other.

18th October - Woke up punctually at 4 in the morning, and spread out the carpet for the prayer-meeting Immediately after prayers, I spun for an hour and a half Last evening I was with Mahatmaji in his room till 9-30 P M I had to do so as yesterday was his "day of silence" All the time he was engaged in writing something. This morning he revised it and gave it to me for despatch to the Young India I found that it was all "Notes" for this week. Then he handed to me several newspapers which I was to look over and from which I was to make cuttings, if there was anything which he ought to look into He asked me to write a letter to Mr Rajagopalachari of Madras, and also gave me some correspondence to do In addition, I have now and then to attend to the small details of work in the For Devadas would not give me much of kitchen work to do, and would himself attend to the more laborious items. But I find that, little by little the opportunity has been coming to me to clean and wash Mahatmaji s plates to peel the fruits for him and take to him his food, and do similar other services. I am feeling that it is part of my good fortune to be able to serve him in these various ways. The Maulana Saheb has drafted another message in Urdu and made it over to me for translation into English. The Maulana, a learned scholar of the experience is ever en gaged in discriminating between the fitness and the "un fitness of every single thing. His minute examination of even the most insignificant matters has often reminded me of the keenness with which our ancient Hindu logicians debated as to whether the thud accompanying the fall of the fruit from the palm tree is precodent or antecedent to the fall.

roth October-While m Bombay I met Mr Shyam Sundara Chakravarti Editor of the Servert of Calentta I have no present recollection of what passed between him and me Bot I remember that he put me one special question He said to me- What do you think was characteristic of Mahatmaii s life ? In answer I gave him a number of incidents of Mahatmaji s life to show in a general way the vast difference between his ways and the ways of ordinary men. Nevertheless said I there is one thing in special which is truly characteristic of Mahatmaii. It is He does not look upon anybody as in any special sense his own, so much so that even his own wife and sons are not allowed to think or feel that they have any special claim on him. It appears as if everybody has an equal claim on him and he looks upon all with an equal eve That such is the mark of highly elevated souls I have known, having read of it in books. But in the case of Mahatmaji, I have been able to study it at first hand, through numberless little facts and incidents of his life"

Last evening, after a whole day's work I was feeling tired, and had betaken myself to my room for rest But I was sent for, for there were still arrears of correspondence to clear off. To some of the letters he had himself, written out replies But having spent the best part of the day in writing for Young India, he also was feeling fatigued and so my help was necessary. He handed to me some of the letters to answer, with instructions as to how they were to be answered He would sign the letters, but I must write out the answers myself I had to remain with him till 10 PM, doing as he asked me He put several "reports" into my hand and asked me to give him their substance orally, then and there About the letters I thought that if I could give him satisfaction by writing out the replies properly, that would considerably lighten his labours. That thought cheered me, but I felt also a creeping fear that I was likely to fail, for the work was responsible, and my powers were so limited. He has a style of his own which consists in expressing the maximum of thought within the compass of a minimum of words. It would be no easy matter for me to be able to imitate this style Besides, there was the question of writing English correctly I was thus feeling uneasy However, I have done some of the letters and submitted them to him. He has signed them without making any material alterations This has to some extent dispelled my fears Then he has given me some further work to do He has asked me to look through the old files of Young India and the Times Year Book, and find out some references for him This I have also doue I had enough experience of this sort of work in connection with the Dawn Magazine having had to find out references for my teacher Mr Mukerji (the Editor) This kind of work has no terrors for me But I do feel nervous when writing letters which would go over Mahatmaji s signature I would not mind writing letters for Mahatmaji over my own name

I hear that we shall be leaving for Delhi on the 30th instant. The All India Congress Committee will commence its business at Delhi on the 4th November From Delhi we shall be going to Lahore for a day or two Mahatmaji has made up his mind not to go out on any further tour He has set his heart on concentrating on Gujarat, and making it the centre of his activities. It would appear that he is about to launch a new and big campaign with Gujarat as the base He is watching how things are progressing in each separate district of Gujarat and contributing articles every week to the Navajitan (his Gujarati weekly) discussing matters from fresh poluts of view and preparing the mind of the Gujaratis for the coming struggle But Lala Lajpat Rai has addressed a most appealing telegram of invitation and although Mahatmaji is most unwilling to go anywhere out side Gnjarat, he has had to consent to be at Lahore for a day or two after finishing his work at Delhi Mahatmaji has made an exception here for invitations (by wire) have been pouring in everyday and he has consistently declined them 11ء

20th October —6-30 A.M I am not going to spin now as I have something very important to write which I must do immediately This morning after the prayers, Mahatmaji addressed us at some length I could not understand his Gujarati, but I could hear him making frequent mention of my name and that of another Ashram member I therefore made every effort to follow his speech, but I could not make out anything. Afterwards I got an Ashram friend of mine to report for me Mahatmaji's address, and I am giving below the gist. Mahatmaji had spoken for about 40 minutes, and my friend could not give a very lucid account, nevertheless the substantial facts may be gathered from what follows

Mahatman began thus -"As soon as I woke up this morning at four, my mind involuntarily turned towards two persons,—one being X and the other Krishnadas" He enquired if X was present at the prayer meeting and learning that he was not, he paused for a while, and then went on to say,-I have noticed that something has been worrying X always, but I have found also that whatever the work entrusted to him, he does it most ungrudgingly keeps his grief to himself, but expects at the same time that I should be able to probe it myself But I am always so busy with work that to keep an eye on every one of you finding out your particular needs and grievances would be almost an impossibility for me, unless of course you came and frankly told me all about them I am therefore in a fix not knowing how to help X out of his trouble If any of you can tell me what it is, I shall feel relieved and know how to deal with it ", Mahatmaji rext said,-"When lately all sorts of rumours of my arrest were in the air, I expressed the wish that the publication of Young India should be But since then, (and even so recently as the day before yesterday) many friends have approached me and given me their assurance that there was no need to worry over Navajwan and Young India and that they should be able to conduct both in a manner worthy of their past during my absence in gaol I am not particular about Navagrous but my belief is that it would not be easy to preserve the style and individuality of Young India But the thing may be possible if I can give the necessary train ing to people from now for this I have chosen Pyanial and Krishnadas. Everyone of us here in the Ashram should think it his duty to become responsible for and specialise in some particular work. For I am not sure how it will fan with me when lanuary comes. If Swaraj is won even then our work will not be over on the contrary its scope will widen enormously. For then we shall have to work censelessly to prevent the country from lapsing into its old state of torpor or apathy On the other hand if Swaraj is not won it will be incumbent on you to undertake the responsibility of conducting the Ashram and then each one of you will have to take charge of some one or other branch of Ashram work If there is no Swaraj I cannot tell you non what is in store for me. May he I shall be lodged in prison or it might also be that my bodily system would receive a shock from which it might not recover. Therefore, it is for you now before I have left you to think and decide on your course of action. and to that end each one of you can put me such questions as you feel necessary

After giving these necessary instructions Mahatmaji dwelt at great length on the need for observing the vows and rules of the Ashram sorrowfully pointing out that there were many who kept away from the prayer meetings.

Mahatmajı's remarks have produced a great sti

throughout the Asram, and I found the inmates assembling in groups, conversing and discussing Mahatmaji's question. It was understood that he was preparing to bid farewell to them, and the faces of all were sad and heavy with the weight of deep anxiety.

Almost the whole of the day Mahatmaji was working At 3 o' clock he was feeling exwithout intermission hausted, and so laid himself down to rest for a short while. I was asked to keep away the flies He speaks so fast when giving orders that one could with difficulty follow him I sat fanning away the flies There has been a regular invasion of flies at the Ashiam this season. They are proving extremely troublesome but Mahatmaji would bear the annoyance in silence That is why we have now and then to go and fan away the flies without our being asked by him went to bed at 8 P M J also was feeling tired But he asked me to rub oil At night when he takes to his bed for sleep, oil is rubbed on his forehead and feet. That has been the usual practice Twice he pointed to his chest without saying anything, but I could not catch his meaning, and went on as before He kept silent Then when "Ba" came there, he uttered the one word "chest" She explained to me that no more oil was to be applied to the forehead Then, bidding me go to bed, she herself began to rub the oil on his chest I continued to sit near Mahatmaji for a littlewhile longer, and then left and went to sleep at 9 P M

PREPARING TO BID HAREWELL -II

21st October -Going to bed at 9 last evening I got in at three this morning. I find that nowadays I do not stand in need of more than six hours of sleep. Rising I an all Nature wearing a smiling appearance in the clear, silver moonlight. The inmates were then all fast asleep Far away on the other bank of the river is the cremation ground of Ahmedahad. In that solemn stillness of the night some one was chanting aloud some Sansknt hymn while performing his ablutions at the burning chat. I rose and with slow gentle steps walked to the prayer ground. There I gave myself up to musing and my thoughts revolved in no coherent manner round the question of my country of the movement and of Mahatmail himself. Since the day Mr. Mukern heard that In Mahatman s opinion his body might not survive the shock of the failure of his movement. he has been impressing upon me the duty of devoting myself heart and soul to ministering to the needs and comforts of Mahatman's body. He strongly believes that there is a hidden power in personal service if it is truly sincere and disinterested which can so work on the inner spirit of man as to make it impossible for it to yield to the temptation of desiring a separation from the physical body. But such power and privilege of true disinterested service thought I must be a special cift vouchsafed by Providence and I could not discover how I was specially qualified for that evalted type of work. While-

I sat revolving these thoughts in my mind, I saw Mahatmaji leaving his bed The open verandah where he sleeps could be seen from the prayer-ground I could see from my distance that, as soon as he got up, he took up a broom and began sweeping the floor of his sitting room. I ran up to him, and took from him the broom and began to sweep myself In the meantime, he himself spread out his carpet and arranged the desk and writing materials. As soon as everything was ready he was busy writing something Now-a-days, the morning prayer meeting sits at 5-30 instead of at 5 So when it was time he left his writing work and joined in the prayer I went up to him again at 6-30, when it was quite light He said to me,-" From to-morrow forward, let my sitting room be swept clean, and the carpet laid, at 4 o'clock " I promised that it would be done He next inquired if I could follow all that he spoke yesterday at the prayer-meeting I said, "I could not understand your Gujarati speech, but I got it from an inmate who under--stood you that you wished to train me for work in connection with Young India" To this Mahatmaji replied, "Not you alone, but Pyarılal also I have asked some others too, to write something Henceforth you will also write something everyday, and submit the same to me I want to see how the work would go on in my absence Young India has become very influential now-a-days, and you can do a great deal of good by its means That is why I am anxious to get for myself from beforehand some rough idea as to how far the work of Young India could go on in my absence "

I wanted to make clear to Mahatmaji my own position in the matter So I began thus,—"I hardly think that it would be possible for any one else to conduct Young India in the way you are doing. The words that came out of the depths of your heart are endowed with a special energy. Even if others said the very same things, these would not carry the same consistion. For in my opinion, your words carry with them some latent power which gives them, their authority.

Then I proceeded to add - Whatever I am ordered to do I will try my very best to carry out. But I cannot for get that the power of assimilation is something wholly different from the power of origination. During my long years of association with Mr Mukerli I had opportunities of getting familiar with higher thoughts and ideas and I have acquired also something of the power of following and understanding an intellectual discussion. But if a new problem arises and I be called upon to think independently nn it an I solve it for myself. I fear I have not the power of doing so nor have I such confidence in me that I shall be able to acqoire it soon. Firther I have noticed one characteristic of your writing In your answer to the Poet, Rabindranath Tagore's article 'The Call of Truth , while not hesitating to expose what you conceived to be the Poet s errors von have not failed to do foll justice to what you recognised to be true in that article. For os to preserve this mental balance is very difficult. We are so much at the mercy of our likes and our dislikes that, roughly speaking these and not the call of Truth may be said to determine our course of action. In many instances we find that the power of separating the true from the untrue in any particular matter and then of holding to the true while disowning the untrue that power is denied to us.

Mahatmajl was pleased with what I said but he-wanted to explain that there was no cause for fear - "What you say is perfectly true," said he, "but persevere. If you persevere you will find that the power of discrimination and judgment will slowly unfold itself. For the time-old basic truths of the universe are not more than a few in number All other truths are but applications of those primary truths to altered circumstances, times and places The basic truths would remain the same now as hereafter, but the applied truths would vary from time to time with the change of time, place and environment Therefore, the more firmly you are rooted in your convictions as regards the basic truths, the more readily will the power of "originality" or "invention" come to you From an early age I have had my training in separating truths from untruths, and looking at them as two distinct entities power of discriminating truth from untruth has therefore become quite natural for me I am thus in a position to do justice to even an iota of truth although it might lie obscured among a heap of untruth Of one and the same principle, the positive aspect is known as Truth, and the negative as Ahimsa or non-violence. Everything is included in Truth On principle, therefore, there is no need for preaching Ahunsa separately Nevertheless such propaganda has become necessary in view of the special requirements of the times If one is firmly planted in Truth, Ahimsa or non-violence follows as a matter of course" After giving me this advice, Mahatmaji exhorted me again to write something for Young India everyday He told me that whatever was worth accepting in my writing, he would accept, the rest he would reject. This injunction of Mahatmaji's I must carry out whatever the cost. Having seen the whole country with myown eyes in Mahatmaji s company, I am now experiencing a certain change of feeling within. I am beginning to envisage India from a new angle of vision as an altogether new entity. Hitherto I was not accustomed to think on any problem affecting the country with a sense of personal responsibility but my experiences gathered during the last tour will stand me in good stead, and I must henceforth begin to think on Indian problems so as to equip myself for Mahatmaji s task.

22nd October - Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya arriv ed here this morning and was closeted with Mahatman for two hones. When Pandit Malaviya arrived Mahatmali was not in his room, and not knowing where he had gone I went about in all hurry to make enquiries. Those who live in the Ashram with their families are lodged at some distance in houses standing in a double row which look like barracks. When I arrived there I found Mahatmaji going about from door to door, and enquiring about the needs and convenience of the inmates. My impression at the time was that he was then taking his final leave of them all in that way While he was so engaged, I went and informed him of Pandit Malaviya's arrival He soon came back to his room Panditji now saw Mahatmaji for the first time wearing his loin cloth and with a bare body Mahatmajl was looking like an ascetic and Panditji was visibly moved Advancing towards him and warmly grasping his hand Panditil feelingly said,- Why, brother should you thus dress yourself? Is it right? Then they sat together and the conversation being private I came away from Mahat maji s room Once I looked from a distance, and saw that Malavryaji was explaining and that Mahatmaji was quietly listening It is now 12-30, and still the conference was not ended. With Malaviyaji has come his son Govind. Govind has given Devadas to understand that Malaviyaji had an interview with the Viceroy, Lord Reading, and that he has come to see Mahatmaji in that connection. Govind said,—"I am absolutely certain father will be able to convince Mahatmaji." I do not know what all this is about, but I understand that Lord Reading has said nothing about Mahatmaji's arrest and I infer that Mahatmaji is not going to be arrested now.

23rd October —This morning Mahatmaji inquired if yesterday I had written any article. I had to say, "No" I am feeling uneasy at not having been able to carry out his wishes. And yet, this morning also, when after prayers he was referring to Young India, he mentioned my name in that connection. I alone know how feeble are my powers. In the first place my command over the English language is limited, and the subject-matter itself is too complex for my understanding. Not 'knowing how to acquire the power of thinking out difficult problems, I am feeling miserable and worried.

24th October — Malaviyaji has joined us in the daily routine of the Ashram He is not in the best of health, and yet last morning when the prayer bell rang out at 4, he came and attended the prayer-meeting Mahatmaji gave the seat of Acharya[†] to Pandit Malaviya, and sitting by Panditji's side he joined in the prayers The prayers over, Mahatmaji requested Malaviyaji to give some religious instruction to the members Panditji, as befitted a true Brahman with whom offering of religious instruction is a birth right, gave a long discourse Then in the course of the day he left the Ashram for the city

This morning I attempted au article with the caption ' Uoder Swarai and wrote out a considerable part of it. To-day being Monday Mahatmaji s day of silence, I have to be constantly by his side but as I had to write the article I could not spend much time with him. At three in the afternoon he sent for me through Devadas He had given me a secood Urdu message coocerning the Moplah rebellion from the pen of Maulana Azad Sobani to translate into English. Knowing as I did that he had not been particularly impressed by the Maolana a first message on the same subject. I had not yet taken up the second. When I said that. he wrote down for me the words - 'Just condense the whole into a single paragraph This I did I wanted also to explain why I had to keep away from him the whole of the day. I therefore submitted for his inspection as much of my article "Under Swaraj as I had written as also Note on the arrest of Mr I M Sen Gupta of Chittagong He looked through them and wrote the following remarks.-"Hoder Swaraj is shaping itself all right you should finish The Chittagoog note is not bright enough and is some what censorious I explained that it was my intention to complete Under Swara; with one more paragraph. He wrote in reply - As it is, it does not read complete, or as if It is ending with two or three sentences—but try that I was under the impression that the article was growing too long, and I had therefore thought fit to cut it short. But now I would write rather elaborately Mahatmali oodded assent.

25th October -I have succeeded in completing

"Under Swaraj", and have submitted it to him. What fresh subject should I write about every day? That is the thought that is uppermost in my mind. I have never tried my hand at writing short paragraphs. Yet perhaps it is such writing that finds most favour with Mahatmaji. There is one particular defect from which I must free myself. In going to write I unconsciously drift into over-elaborateness, and my writing becomes heavy. What Mahatmaji wants is a clear, crisp and cut-and-dried style.

Pandit Malaviyaji had left day before yesterday, but Mahatmaji has sent him a wire asking his presence again at Ahmedabad. The relations between the mill-owners and the mill-hands of Ahmedabad have been getting strained Mahatmaji on behalf of the labourers has been trying his best to come to an understanding with the mill-owners. But nothing has come of the negotiations, and so as a last resource, he is contemplating a Satyagraha fight by the workmen. This apparently has brought down the owners, and they have agreed to submit the dispute to the arbitration of Pandit Malaviya. It appears probable that Panditji will have to spend some days at Ahmedabad in connection with this matter.

There is much to learn by observing how the negotiations are being conducted. Mahatmaji's method of fight is quite novel. What becomes of a fight if there is no hurling of abusive epithets or no attempt at brow-beating? If a similar situation had arisen in Bengal, the sensation it would have created would have been immense. But what do we find here? Here we see the millionaire President of the Mill-owners' Association coming down from the City almost every day to the Ashram to meet Mahatmaji, sitting with him on the same carpet and discussing the points in dispute in a spirit of the namost friendliness. Here are the representatives of two opposing parties, and the dispute itself is serious enough in all conscience, but if a stranger came and saw them, the impression he would carry away would be that of two friends engaged in a friendly chat. To be able to bring so much of gentleness and gentlemanliness to bear on the conduct of a fight on which both sides are so very keen is a unique phenomenon attributable to the power of Mahatmaji's character and personality. So also on other occasions, I have found that under his magnetic influence persons coming to meet him left sside their hauteur and became the most sedate calm and well behaved of peoples.

Entering Mahatmaji's room at midday. I found him amiling all by himself in gleeful mood. As soon as I entered he said Krishnadas so many telegrams come to me daily and yet not knowing what to do with the forms 1 used to tear them. It gave me pain and I was thinking on what use they could be put to At last I have hit upon a plan He then took up a form and showed me how to make a cover out of it. He then directed me to prepare envelopes from the telegraph forms received by us every day. I have begun to make these covers, and he has been using them for the purpose of his letters. He has given them the name of ' Patent Envelopes He finds an much genuine pleasure in using such covers that he would not touch envelopes of far superior quality even when they would be placed before him This small matter however shows what keen judgment he brings to bear upon even small things. It also shows in a most striking manner how at the time when a fierce India-wide national fight was raging, Mahatmaji could keep himself cool and collected and what was more remarkable still, keep up a lightsome mood

I will give here another illustration of Mahatmaji's sense of humour and buoyancy of spirits. Some of the teachers of the National College in Bombay, having come on a visit to Ahmedabad during the Dewali holidays, saw Mahatmaji, and asked him for advice as to how they should best spend the vacation. He was observing silence on that day and wrote down the following answer

Card, Spin, Weave, Spin, Weave, Card, Weave, Card, Spin

On reading the reply the teachers burst out laughing, while one of them took the piece of paper on which it was written to be kept as a memento

It has been arranged that, leaving Sabarmati on 1st November by the 2 P M train, we should reach Delhi on the evening of the 2nd. Then, perhaps, after a tour of only a few days in the Punjab, we shall be returning to the Ashram. Mahatmaji is most reluctant nowadays to leave Gujarat and go elsewhere for other work. Here in Gujarat the spread of Khaddar has been the most striking. Gujarat also seems to have acquired a firmer hold on methods of non-violent work than any of the other provinces. It seems to me that Mahatmaji would, send his ultimatum to Government about the middle of November and stake his all on it. As day succeeds day, I am struck by the fact that he now and then lapses into moods of absentmindedness. From the day of his arrival at the Ashram, people were coming group after group, to have a sight of him, and the rush of visitors was particularly great oo sacred days like the Ekadari* or on days of religious festivity. And every day there were offerings made to Mahatmaji ranging from small amounts like two annas, four annas or eight annas to one five or even ten rupees at times—the total number of such daily offerings mounting to a high figure. But this loterferiog with his work, the visitors have latterly not been allowed to see him in his room. They are now being turned back from the very entrance passage of the Ashram.

26th October -Since night before last, there has been a sudden spell of cold weather and I caught a slight cold Devadas coming to know of it, gave me tea and quinine and I have got rid of the cold. Of late, attacks of fever have been very frequent here. The fever looks very much like malana. There is a resident doctor in the Ashram with whom Mahatmaji is found frequently engaged in discussing the causes of the ootbreak. How could malana have found entrance into a place so scrupulously clean and well kept as this? The tea and the quinine have heated my brain and I did not have good sleep last night. Nevertheless there has been no break in my routine of work. I got up at three as usual and before it was foor had finished my other duties like sweeping the floor of Mahatmaji's room, arranging the carpet for Mahatmaji etc. At Delhi we shall be the guest of Dr Ansari. I hear that there is a proposal to go to Mottra and Panipat after finishing Delhi, but so far there has been nothing settled with regard to our movements in the Punjab The tour programme will be arranged after reaching Delhi

I did a fairly good day's writing yesterday, but would Mahatmaji approve and accept the same? An Indian sojourner in England had written a long letter to Mahatmaji Mahatmaji asked me to write out an answer and show it to him. He has passed the draft reply. Only he has scored out the word, "Mahatmaji", wherever I had to write it, and put in "Mr Gandhi" instead. In another place, I wrote, "India can remain within the Empire, if it is consistent with her dignity and self-respect." He has altered it into "India can remain with the British, if it is consistent with her dignity and self-respect." The writer's point is that Mahatmaji would do well to place the question of Indian Swaraj in the forefront of his movement, while the redress of the Punjab and Khilafat wrongs should find a secondary place.

grate October —Yesterday I had the hairs of my head cropped The Gujarati barber has so used his skill that, I am told, I could no longer he recognised for a Bengali To-day is the New Year's Day for Gujarat Among Gujaratis the year comes to an end on the Dewali day Amongst Bengalis, on the Bijaya Day, and after the immersion in the river of the goddess Durga after a three days' worship, there is the custom of meeting friends and relatives, and making obeisance to elders. A similar custom is observed here in Gujarati on the Gujarati New Year's Day, when the Gujaratis meet friends and salute elders. Yesterday I had planned that this morning I should be the first to approach Mahatmaji, and make my New Year's salutation to him. I rose as usual at the appointed hour, and as on other days, I did my morning doties of sweeping the floor and arranging the carpet for Mahatmajl so that when he rose at 4.1 was there before him. Net I felt too shy to offer him my salutation. Then after the prayers when he came back to his room group after groop of Ashram people came and rendered their obelsances to him. After they had left and there was nobody else in the room. I made bold to approach him and made my obelsance by touching my forehead to the floor which however was rither clossify done. He looked op to see me but without a word I shipped away from his presence.

Among the newspaper cuttings that Mr Mokerji has sent me is one describing the panie in the Manchester plecegoods market caused by the effects of the Mnn Co-operation movement. Last night I read out the cutting to Mahatmaji, and when I had finished he said with a smile on his lips, it is friend there need be no fear. Everything will shape itself all right in the end. Another cutting sent by Mr Mukerji is from the Servani newspaper of Calcutta. I have given it him to read and I am sure he will read it with pleasure. It contains an expression of the great chemist. Dr Roy s views have undergone a complete change he being now in favoor of the wheel. A long letter from him to Mahatmaji has reached here. On the top of it I find written in big characters the word Confidental.

This morning about nine two English geotiemen ac compaoied by two English ladies came to visit Mahatmaji but as it is Monday today his day of silence, he could out talk to them. It fell to me to show them round the Ashram. The lades were very much interested in the aplanting-whitels.

at work. I took advantage of the occasion to suggest to them that they might as well set about spinning on their own account. This set them laughing.

The charge of Mahatmaji's English correspondence has been slowly passing into my hands, and as a result my duties have been getting heavier. My routine of work nowadays may be roughly given as follows -- I rise at 3, and perform my own devotions and other duties 3-45 A M. I go to sweep Mahatmaji's room, and arrange the carpet for him to sit on, after which I repair to the prayer-grounds to lay Khaddar sheets on, to seat the congregation and arrange a special seat there for Mahatmaji From 4 45 to 6 A M is the Ashram prayer, after which I have to get ready Mahatman's breakfast which consists of goat's milk and peeled fruits. He takes it every morning at 630 A M After breakfast he is usually free and alone, and I take the opportunity to have instructions from him as tegards correspondence and other necessary matters case he has visitors after breakfast, I go and take my own breakfast Then up till 8 30 A. M., I attend to Mahatmaji's office correspondence From 830 to 930 A M I do odd jobs for the kitchen, after which I have to attend to the numerous telegrams which are delivered about this time I sit near him, and write out the replies as dictated by him. Between 11 and 1130 AM, I take my principal meal, while Mahatmaji does his daily spinning for half-an-hour At 11 30 A M, I go and get hot water, etc, for his bath At 12 noon, he takes his midday meal As at breakfast, so also now, he drinks about a pint and a half of goat's milk (warmed) and takes some fruits. But now in addition to the above, he takes some five or six pieces of

Bhakers (a style of Gujarats bread) fried in ghee (melted butter) prepared from goat s milk. After the midday meal Mahatmail reads newspapers for half an hour and at 1-30 he takes a nap In the meantime the post has arrived and I am engaged in sorting the letters. As soon as he is up he puts me the question- How long have I slept ?-He goes to sleep for some 30 to 40 minutes and when I tell him how long he would ex Jaim - So long? From 3 to 3 30 P.M. I remain busy with the newspapers, hurriedly looking over the news. I have to tell him every day the news of the Moolah outbreak of Malabar as given in the daily 'Hindu of Madras. Then I have to give him orally the substance of the louger letters as well as of the Reports (from the Congress Provincial Centres) which have come by the day s post. Then I take away with me the letters whose replies he asks me to write This goes on till 5 or 5-30 P.M. But during the whole afternoon while Mahatmaji would be thus husily engaged crowds of common people anxious to have a Darshan (i.e. auspicious sight) of Mahatman and make their salutation would be coming in groups filling Mahat maji s room. He takes his evening meal at aix a little before sundown At seven the prayer meeting begins, After prayers many people come to see Mahatmaji, but he takes care to dispose of them quickly enough, and about eight he motors to the city. After he has left I begin arranging his papers. As I have to get up at three in the morning I go to bed before nine 'Ba (Mrs Gandhi) and Devades keeping awake to attend to Mahatmali when he returns.

CHAPTER XV

ALL-INDIA CONGRESS WORKING COMMITTEE AT DELHI

The All-India Congress Committee is going to hold its next session on the 4th November Mahatman, therefore, started for Delhi on the 1st November Miss Anasuva Ben accompanied him. The venerable Mr. Abbas Tyebii of Baroda had wired Devadas to reserve a berth for him. in the The telegram could be interpreted in either of two ways According to Mahatman, Mr Tyebu wanted the berth to be reserved in the same compartment as his, but Devadas thought differently In Devadas's opinion Mr Tyebu wanted the berth elsewhere, failing which he might travel in the same compartment with Mahatmaji Arriving at the Sabarmati station, and finding that his berth was in Mahatmaji's compartment, he felt rather nervous and exclaimed, 'Horror of horrors! Bapuji, what gentleman could possibly travel with you in the same compartment? To be invaded by crowds at every station, and to be continually on the alert to avoid a collision with them would be enough to kill out a man." However, Mr Tyebji now for once could not obtain an absolution for himself from this arduous and irksome piece of duty

Besides Devadas and myself, Mr Pyeralal also was one of the party After our Delhi tour he would take a short leave and proceed to his home in the Punjab Devadas and Pyeralal had already left for the station Mahatmaji was busy doing some writing work, and would not leave till the very last moment I was waiting to arrange the papers and take with me the portfolio for his use during the tours. I had therefore to be seated by his side on our way to the Sabarmati station in the Ashram tonga.* When we were half way he asked me the following question rather abrupt "7—" Don't you write to Satish Babu † regularly?

I replied yes I do

Mahatmaji - When I met him last in Calcutta we ad a talk about the Charks and I requested him to give ie his personal experiences with the wheel. I expressed to atish Babu my view that what the Poet (Rabindranath agore) says in regard to this matter is not well-grounded cannot make out why spinning should be held as standing a the way of a man a mental or spiritual growth Is it not he teaching of the Gita that the wise man who keeps ontrol over his mmd does not get entangled in his ontward ctivities? For he acts without feeling identified with is actions. Therefore if we could not cultivate the habit of doing our acts ontwardly with the help of our senseorgans, while inwardly at the same time we kept control wer ourselves, then the mevitable result would be that the nind would go on spinning out a crowd of outgoing houghts and desires and would ultimately succumb to heir lure. That way hes misery. Therefore I am of pointon that if we could practise spinning with our hands rhile we kept our mind controlled within our mental and puritual development would be none the worse for such stactice I am eater to know what Satish Rabus. experience is in this matter

A two-wheeled conveyance drawn by a single horse † Mr Mukerji, my teacher

I —"He has not yet written to me anything on the subject, but I know that his sympathies are with you, and though he has not openly joined your movement for reasons of his own, nevertheless he has done what he can to further your work In case of your arrest you wish me to take -over partially the work of Young India But I know I have not the requisite ability So as a last resource I have written to Mr Mukerji to come and do what he can to help me in the matter

Mahatman - "Have you done so? You have done very well, indeed!" speaking with special emphasis on the words, very well

I -"But I am not sure whether he will agree to the proposal Before, he used to do a good deal of public work, but latterly he has kept in the background, not feeling inclined to pose as a public worker But if God wills otherwise, then it would be a different thing"

Then the conversation turned on the good old days of Swadeshi agitation in Bengal He listened to me intently and I spoke out freely and fully

We arrived at the station. Then Mahatmaji entered his compartment, and took the seat reserved for him, Devadas keeping him company, while Pyeralal and myself, with Mr. Maili of the Karnatak Provincial Congress Committee, got into another compartment and accommodated ourselves there. How shall I describe the vast crowds that came to have a mere sight of Mahatmaji at various places on the way? The reader will be able to call up a picture from such descriptions as I have already given in previous chapters Mahatmaji has travelled by this route many a time before, and yet the eagerness of the public to have a sight of him does not abate Devadas calls this line the worst line that is the worst for his father judging by the size of the crowds that assemble to greet him. While passing through the great Indian States of Rajoutana renowned in Iudian history -- Marwar Almere, Kishengarh, Jayour Alwar etc. and witnessing the roll of surging humanity like the roll of ocean waves enchanting visions of India a past greatness and glory rose before my mind a eve-But as they rose so they disappeared as quickly as in a dream. There is the familiar Urdn saying - Delbi is still far off and yet as it seemed to me quickly enough we covered a distance of some thirty hours of railway journey reaching Delhi on the evening of 2nd November (8 P M) The terrific roar sent up by the multitudinous throng at the station as the train steamed in seemed to me to send a tremor through the earth beneath our feet while the crowd itself was swayed hither and thither like dry leaves caught in a whirlwind The scene reminded one of the day of universal destruction But the hands of skilled organisers were working unseen to prevent a chaos and so instead of going under. Mahatmair and his party were enabled safely to reach their destination

At Delhi Mahatmaji was the guest of Dr Ansari. The Doctor lived in his house No 1 Dariagunj in the eastern ontskirts of the city. On the eastern side the city ends here Beyond and adjoining the Doctor's residence I saw the City wall still standing although in dilapidated condition. Beyond the wall as far as eye could reach stretches a vast sandy plain through which the dark waters of the Kalindi are seen winding their way until they lose themselves in the dlim distance. The name

Dariagunj^{*} has probably been given to this part of the City as it appears to issue out of the river Jumna

The next morning I saw the sun slowly rising from the bosom of the vast eastern plain. A little to the northwest of Dr Ansan's house, the Juma Masjid, the Fort and the Imperial Palace, all bearing on their bosom historic marks of the power and greatness of the Mogul Emperors, still stand, unaffected by the ravages of time, as though they were so many mansions newly erected But those days of Mogul ascendancy and Mogul splendour, all, all have gone had their day, and are no more. As we were nearing the City. I could see from the train, at various points, the remains of many a locality once humming with life, saw also the ruins of many a fort and palace. Then saw I, the next morning, to the east of the City, that vast level plain stretching like a sandy waste up to the very verge of the distant And I said to myself-Truly, indeed, is Delhi India's greatest grave-yard

What mighty significance attaches to this region! Again and again has centralised power, eager to plant its flag at Delhi, sought to seize her to proclaim its sovereignty over the whole of India. But, again and again, do we find the same power slowly crumbling down, till at last it lay buried beneath Delhi's soil. Earthly power may best be employed in the service of mankind, but instead, if it is employed to bring others under its yoke, or to serve narrow selfish objects, or to minister to mere material enjoyment, it is bound to meet with a speedy dissolution. As if to illustrate this eternal truth of life in a living, visible anamer, does ancient Delhi, although its soul has

^{*} Daria in vernacular is river; Gunj is city

A. I C WORKING COMMITTEE AT DELHI 367

departed, still continue to wear its ancient physical garments.

Nn people whose life on earth was not the visible expression of some great principle or ideal could ever hope to preserve Intact its historical entity its historical personality The principle of Individuality or the desire for individual Freedom was the animating principle of Greek life and culture Similarly the principle of Order 10 the urre towards the establishment of order form ed the corner-stone of Roman civilisation. When these ideals of national life began to hum less and less brightly In Greek and Roman hearts the disintegration of their national lives set in and their likingical personality soon suffered an eclipse. Mahatmali therefore has horsted a new flam, the flag of a great ideal round which the whole country might rally. In the history of the world it is nothing new to find a subject people attempting in throw off the voke of their subjection. Such attempts have been and will be. But what is wholly new in history is the discovery made by Mahatma Gandhi that the wresting of Indian Freedom need not be by methods of violence. He has discovered that there is n way of unning Freedom by means of warfare wholly nonviolent and this is altogether a new thing in world a history Further results follow from this important discovery Ordinardy whenever there is any sort of warfare going, there is the tendency for the lower side of man a nature to assent itself and gain the upperhand. But in a non-violent struggle the most important condition of success being the preservation of peace while the struggle is on it becomes imperative so to train the fighters that their higher instincts are stimulated while the lower ones are kept under control

Therefore it is that non-violent warfare is necessarily conducive to the development of the nobler side of man's nature Secondly, if the political life of India could be organised and built upon the basis of this high ideal, it would be possible then for the peoples of India to realise and maintain a united, national existence on what may be called a natural basis of life. For if we did not proceed from now to build up the forces of cohesion on the lines of non-violence, as suggested by Mahatmaji, but only went on strengthening the "General Will" against the political authorities here in India, we might indeed succeed in breaking up the Government, but with that result? The result would be that with the disappearance of the present Government, the artificial or enforced unity that it has built up would vanish in no time, as has happened before-Mahatmaji's programme of non-violent warfare as a means of winning political freedom is, therefore, an altogether new discovery of the highest import

Mahatmaji has just returned from an all-India tour which has resulted in a universal awakening of political consciousness. The soil having thus been prepared, he has now come to Delhi to sow the seed. Before the year is out, the Government shall have to be made subservient to the Will of the people, and the triple demand of the Punjab, the Khilafat and Swaraj shall have be enforced. With this firm resolve in his mind, Mahatmaji has arranged a plan of work for the country which is now going to publish. He has prepared while travelling in his train, a draft Resolution recommending mass civil disobedience, which he intends to move before the ensuing All-India Congress Committee. Now he is indeed going to play with fire I have already referred to the fact that while at the Ashram I had often found him deep in thought and charged with anxiety The events of 1919 following on the passing of the Rowlatt Act and the immediate launching by him of Civil Disobedience—the scenes of anarchy and bloodshed then enacted in the Punjab and at Delhi Ahmedahad Viramgaum &c. were all fresh in his memory He was therefore now taking stock of all surrounding circumstances and proceeding with all due care and circumspection. He drafted his Resolution accordingly As soon as we reached our quarters at Delbi on the evening of the 2nd instant, he gave us the draft and asked us to make fair copies of the same Mr Pyerilal Mr Maili and I were soon engaged on this work while Mahatman sat up far into the night closeted with Haklm Ajmal Khan Dr Ansari and other great leaders of the City

The next day (3rd November) from 8 A.M. to 1 P M the Working Committee sat and discussed the draft Resolution At 3 P M Mahatmajl paid a brief visit to a meeting of the Central Khilafat Committee Then the Working Committee met again in Mahatmajl's room from 5 to 9 P M Almost all the principal leaders of India were present at this meeting and Mahatmajl's draft was subjected to a minute and critical examination and amended in parts in accordance with the decision of the majority. The amended Resolution was to be placed on the following day (4th November) before the A I C C. In the Working Committee both Mr Kelkar of Poona and Mr Vithalbhai Patel of Bombay while accepting is toto Mahatmajl's plan of starting Civil Disobedience held that no special preliminary training was necessary for our people to qualify for such action Mahatman, however, was convinced of the need of laying down conditions of strict discipline which must in the first instance be fulfilled before either individuals or districts or provinces could be allowed launch out on a campaign of civil disobedience. In this matter, therefore, he had to meet with vehement opposition from Messrs Kelkar and Patel One particular clause of the Resolution was to the effect that if anyone desired to start civil disobedience individually, he should not be permitted to do so unless, in the first place, he had totally discarded the use of foreign cloth and taken to Khaddar (handspun and handwoven) as his habitual personal wear Seth Jamnalal, a devoted follower of Mahatmaji, wanted to make the condition stricter still, and proposed that a further clause be inserted making it obligatory upon every member of the family of the individual civil resister to renounce the use of foreign cloth This was too much for Mr. Kelkar In the body of the draft Resolution Mahatmaji had also inserted a clause declaring that if mass civil disobedience was to be started with a District or a Telisil as a unit, then at least nine-tentlis of the population must have accustomed themselves to the use of Khaddar as their daily wear. This condition was considered to be too strict, and so at the suggestion of Pandit Motilal Nehru it was replaced by the following —"and therein a vast majority of the population must have adopted full Swadeshi, and must be clothed out of cloth handspun and handwoven in that District or Tehsil"

Another clause of the draft Resolution fell among the assembled leaders like a bombshell Mahatmaji had laid down that where an individual proposed to undertake civil dis-

obedience for himself he must know hand-spinning. When the clause was read ont. Pandit Motilal Nehru burst ont langhing Mr Lajpat Rai seemed to have undergone a wonderful transformation. He would no longer come forward to offer any determined opposition to Mahatmali s proposals. Although feeling a little disappointed at this particular proposal he only enquired of Mahatmaji how long it would take to learn hand spinning Hakim Saheb also put the same query to Mahatmali Both Mr Rajendra Prasad of Behar and Deshabbakta Venkatappayya of the Andhra Province of Madras gave an enthusiastic welcome to the proposal while Jamualalu sat silent musing Messrs, Kelkar and Patel indulged in loud angry protests. But Mr C R Das took np Mahatman s side and began arguing with the opponents. He told them that he had himself tried his hand at the wheel and got a few yards of yarn out of it and felt convinced that with some more practice the thing could be easily managed. The proposal was then out to the vote, Messrs Kelkar and Patel both voting against it. Pandit Motilalu Mr Lappat Rai Hakim Saheb and Dr Ansarı remained neutral Mr C R Das voted on Mahatmaji's side and Mr Rajendra Prasad Mr Ven katappayya, Seth Jamualalil and some others votme in its tayour the proposal was finally carried

I was struck to find how Mr C. R. Das was able to lighten Mahatmaji s labours arguing and discussing on the side of Mahatmaji. To me it appeared that at that time no other supporter of Mahatmaji showed the same amount of determination in defending him as did Mr C R. Das When for instance Mr Patel was russing various technical objections and making fine distinctions of all sorts in regard to another matter in opposition to Mahatmaji. I found Mr C R Das rallying to Mahatmaji's support and saying, "Mr Patel, I don't understand the meaning of your opposition". To this Mr Patel immediately retorted, saying, "It is because Mr Das, I still stand where you did six months ago."

Notwithstanding Mr. C. R. Das's strong support of Mahatmaji, it seemed to me that there was in Mahatmaji's mind a lurking suspicion as to whether the leaders had after all thoroughly realised their responsibility it they should embark on a campaign of mass civil disobedience. He felt the need, therefore, of advancing with cautious steps, and this need for caution he tried to impress on the minds of all during the conversations and discussions assembled leaders in the following addressed the strain -"I am going to start mass civil disobedience in Bardoli, one of the Talugas in the district of Surat in The conduct of the campaign will be under my personal guidance From the leaders of the rest of India I would ask for no further help, than that of friendly sympathy in my effort and of active watchfulness that there be no breach of peace in their respective provinces Let them patiently, intently watch the conduct of the proceedings at Bardoli Such moral support would be quite enough for my purpose But the preservation of perfect peace throughout the country is a sine qua non If peace prevails in the rest of the provinces, I have no fear but that victory is bound to crown our efforts"

Mahatmaji proceeded in the same vein, trying to bring home to his hearers what grave responsibility was involved in a war of Mass Civil Disobedience Said he,—"Mass Civil

A. I. C. WORKING COMMITTEE AT DELHI 373

Disobedience is like an earthquake a sort of a general upheaval on the political plane Where the reign of Mass Civil Disobedience begins there the subsisting Government ceases to function. There every policeman every soldier every Government official must either leave the place or enlist in the service of Swara; The police stations the court offices etc. all shall cease to be Government property and shall be taken charge of by the people. But for the purpose there should not be the slightest display or exercise of physical force by the people. The 'Disobedience' should be so complete that if an order was assued on us by the Government saying - Go to the right we must not hesitate to move left ward. But although the opposition to Government must be so determined in character vet the essence of civil disobdience is that it must be undertaken in a spirit of perfect composure. If however the disobedience was wanting in the peaceful spirit, if it was under taken in a spirit of bravado or of insolence or in a mood of angry excitement, resentment or retaliation then the obedience instead of being civil would become criminal in essence and in fact. Therefore not every body is entitled to engage in a fight of civil disobedience Mahatmaji here ended on the same note with which he had begun -namely by emphasizing the absolute need of preserv ing the peace while he was kept engaged at Bardoli. Again saidhe - I would earnestly appeal to you carefully watch how I conduct the campaign at Bardoli and try to learn the lessons thereof And let nobody seek to engage therein without the necessary preparatory train ing Let every province prepare itself by training and let it watch the course of events at Bardoli. That would be enough help for me I do not stand in need of any further or any active help When the Swaraj flag floats victoriously at Bardoli, then the people of the Taluqa next to Bardoli, following in the steps of Bardoli, should seek to plant the flag of Swaraj in their midst. Thus district after district, in regular succession, throughout the length and breadth of India, should the Swaraj flag be hoisted. If, however, while the movement is on, there is the slightest outbreak of violence in any part of the country, then it would not be safe or advisable to prosecute the campaign any further If victory has to be attained by means of civil disobedience, it is absolutely necessary that there should be only one note sounding throughout the length and breadth of the country-the note of concord and harmony among the people If, however, in any part of the country the people concerned should break out into any form of violence, then the whole movement would lose its character as a movement of peace, even as a lute would begin to emit notes of discord moment a single string snaps"

Since early morning (6-30 A M) till late in the evening, almost without a break Mahatmaji remained engaged in these consultations and discussions Even after 9 30 P M, when the Working Committee meeting was over, there was no relief for him, as fresh visitors came in and engaged him in endless discussions. In the meantime, about 7 P M, when important matters concerning Civil Disobedience were under discussion, I had left the place and gone to Seth Jamnalal's lodging in Chandney Chowk, and partook of my evening fare there. I was thus in readiness to attend to Mahatmaji as soon as he was free. Finding that

A. I. C. WORKING COMMITTEE AT DELHI 375 there was no respite for Mahatmail from the invasion of visitors although it was past 9 30 P.M. Mrs. Sarolini Naidu took up a stern attitude and taking her stand near the door way prevented the entrance of visitors into his room. Then the bed was made ready for Mahatmaji and Mrs Naidu left, bidding him good night Then I began rubbing oil on Mahatmaji's head chest, and feet. Once awhile I heard him saying in a low tone- Oh! how terribly exhausted! How can I possibly stand such strain? Then quietly in the course of a few minutes he fell into deep slumber

THE ALL-INDIA CONGRESS COMMITTEE AT DELHI

The 4th November being Friday, the Mussalman members of the A I C C must attend the noon prayers at the Juma Masjid It was, therefore, arranged that there should be a morning sitting of the A I C C from 9 to 11, to be followed by another which will sit at 2 in the afternoon and continue its proceedings late into the evening So from early morning we were busy preparing to be at the place of meeting before it was 9. With regard to this session of the A I C C, the reader has already been told that it was going to be held inspite of the ban placed upon it by the then President of the Congress, Mr Vijayaraghavachari The reader is also aware that the question had been the subject of hot discussion in the newspapers The issue was-'What were the respective powers of the Congress President and the Congress Working Committee?' On this matter, the members of the Working Committee and the President had been at variance from the very first, but the difference had not assumed acute proportions until now The Working Committee had come into being for the first time in accordance with the revised constitution of the Congress* Before this, the President of the Congress had been exercising in his individual capacity emergency powers. With the institution, however, of the Working Committee as the executive of the A.I. C. C. those powers natorally devolved on the Working Committee Under the new rules the members of the Working Committee had to be elected by the A.I. C. C. from among themselves. The Working Committee therefore being its executive became vested with powers belonging to the A.I. C. C. In opposition to this Mr. Vijayaraghavachari claimed the authority which be looged to the President when there was no Working Committee. As the upshot of this conflict of views the Coogress President kept away from the A.I.C. C. meeting and in his absence. Mr. Lajpat. Rai was voted to the chair

But the moment the motion for electing a chairman for the meeting was brought forward. Mr. Jamnadas Mehta a Bombay member rose and in lood vehement tones protested that the President of the Congress having cancelled the meeting it stood cancelled and nobody else was aothorised to convene it. Pandit Motifalii and Mr C R. Das gave effective replies and Mr Mehta was silenced But he came out with another objection Admitting he said that the Working Committee had derived its aothority from the A. I C. C still as n subordinate body it must not be allowed quietly to appropriate all the powers of the latter hody and it was this which the Work ing Committee had been doing. Therefore, no member of the Working Committee should preside over the present Bot it may be continued he that others may feel too shy to come forward and take the chair in the presence of such distinguished leaders of the Congress as Mahatma Gandhi Mr Lajpat Rai Mr C R. Das and Pandit Motilal Nehru. Therefore he would propose him self to the chair and with this he resumed his seat. This strange proposal set the company in a roar, of laughter Unfortunately, however, for Mr Mehta, no one came forward to second his proposition. Then Mr Lajpat Rai was elected to the chair, and the meeting settled down to its Mr Aney, the distinguished Berar leader. now brought forward a motion taking strong exception to the eligibility of the representatives for the Bengal and Madras Provinces to sit as members. He explained that the last preceding Congress held at Nagpur had laid down certain Rules governing the election of members to the A I C C, but these Rules had not been followed in the Madras and Bengal elections, with the result that they had to be cancelled by the Congress President Therefore, concluded Mr Aney, his motion was that the Madras and Bengal representatives not having been duly elected should be required to vacate their seats. Mr. Aney argued with the skill of a practised lawyer. His proposal was duly seconded A Bengal member then got up, and speaking at the top of his voice tried to refute Mr Aney's arguments. At this point Mahatmaji, who was the author of the new election Rules, intervened and explained their real bearing on the The matter then dropped question at issue this way the Mahratta friends were experimenting with methods of obstruction and exploing how far obstructive tactics would pay They had come prepared to try such tactics and were acting in a perfectly organised manner.

When all preliminary objections to the holding of the meeting had thus been got over, Mr Purshottamdas Tandon, an Allahabad leader, proposed that the proceedings of the A I C C should be conducted in the national language, namely, Hindi, and further, that all Congress Committees should be instructed to employ Hindi in place of English Mr Tandou's speech was delivered in beautiful Hindi. But the moment he sat down a Bengali member rose and with the preface I can also give a fine speech in Bengali began to address the audience in that vernacular This Bengali reply to a Hindi speech set the whole house in a roar of laughter In this dilemma Mahatmaji sought a way of escape by proposing that the matter be referred to the Working Committee That saved the House from what threatened to be a linguistic disaster

Starting in this way with mirth and laughter the mem bers became more and more senous as they proceeded to the most important and solemu business of the day namely the consideration of the Resolution on Civil Disobedience. It was clear that there was going to be no direct opposition to that Resolution but every effort was made to tamper with the resolution by relaxing the terms iaid down by Mahatmati as conditions precedent to such Disobedience. One of Mahatmali s points was that moral fitness for embarking on a campaign of civil disobedience was to be gauged by the measure of success attained in hand spinning and in the production and adoption of Khaddar for daily wear Round this clause waged a war of arguments and counter arguments. Then again, the point was raised that it was not right to confine Mass Civil Disobedience to a particular centre or to a single narrow area like Bardoli but that on the contrary it could and should be started simultaneously in a number of different centres. The argument was that if this was done the Government would not be able to concentrate on any particular area and do its worst. Apparently the protagonists of this view were thinking that by means of such

"disobedience" they could harass and embarrass the Government, and also, that by such procedure they would be able to reduce the chances of repression to a minimum It may be noted that behind these thoughts and ideas there was the interplay of a certain type of feeling which was not exactly favourable to Mahatman's cause, the cause of "civil" i e , peaceful disobedience , and which if not properly handled and kept under control might easily set in motion the forces of "criminal" disobedience, i e, armed conflict Indulging in the spirit of " harassing" and " embarrassing" the Government, the passive resisters could have no longer remained "passive," in the sense of their inviting and submitting to suffering at the hands of a violent Government For, the spirit of inflicting injury on Government, through the processes of "harassment", and "embarrassment," would have by natural and gradual stages led on to a spirit of "active" resistance, that is to say, a desire to inflict injury on the Government by the use of physical force That is why Mahatmaji was so very insistent on laying down rigorous conditions of qualification for those who would seek to embark on a course of civil disobedience Civil Disobedience as a political weapon was an altogether new thing. Nobody in India had known of it before. It was Mahatmaji who introduced this weapon for purposes of Indian political agitation And it was with this weapon in his hands that he made bold to declare a peaceful war against the indomitable might of the British Empire Naturally, therefore, the hearts of all brave, ardent spirits were centred on this new type of political warfare And yet, the one leader an this new form of struggle, who was recognised to be an expert and a veteran, was being hampered by his followers. He was demanding that with a view to add to the national strength and ensure at the same time a peaceful atmosphere throughout the country there was oeed to advance warily and to adopt certain preliminary steps of cantioo But the representatives of the people in the A. I C. C. it seemed were too eager for the fray and were not quite prepared to go with Mahatmaji the whole way This appeared to me somewhat of a paradox. If Mahatmaji must be given the supreme leadership in this war of Civil Disobedience then it stood to reason that his plan of campaign must also be accepted. It was increasing ly clear to me that the members had not yet grasped the real nature of the struggle contemplated by Mahatmajl I felt that the members had not yet puste realised that it was not merely a revolt against the Government that Mahatmail was preaching. If the members had visualised the real character of the fight as cootemplated by Mahatmair of they had in fact, put as much emphasis on the non violent aspect of the revolt, as on the revolt itself, then there would not have been such strong opposition to Mahatmail s proposals as was actually in evidence at the A. I C C meeting

A little before sundown Devadas and I returned to our quarters for we had to arrange and take Mahatmaji's evening meal to the place of meeting. I was detained there as my presence was specially required and Devadas took Mahatmaji's food to him. That very night the amended Civil Disobedieoce Resolution received the assent of the All Iodia Coogress Committee. The oext day the 5th November the Committee had a final sitting from 11 A.M. to 1-30 P.M. and passed a number of other Resolutions also. I must oot omit to mention here the skill-tact and ability with which Mr Lajpat Rai conducted the proceedings and which made the session truly famous. The A I. C C meeting over, we returned to our quarters. Then about 4-30 PM the Working Committee met again in Mahatmaji's room. It soon filled again with a vast throng of visitors.

The full text of the famous Civil Disobedience Resolution as passed on the 4th November at the Delhi session of the All-India Congress Committee is given below --

"Whereas there is not much over one month for the fulfilment of the national determination to establish Swaraj before the end of the year, and whereas the Nation has demonstrated its capacity for exemplary self-restraint by observing perfect non-violence over the arrest and imprisonment of the Ali Brothers and the other leaders, and whereas it is desirable for the Nation to demonstrate its capacity for further suffering and discipline sufficient for the attainment of Swaraj,

"The All-India Congress Committee authorises every Province, on its own responsibility, to undertake Civil Disobedience including non-payment of taxes, in the manner that may be considered the most suitable by the respective Provincial Congress Committees subject to the following conditions —

"(1) In individual Civil Disobedience, the individual must know hand-spinning and must have completely fulfilled that part of the programme which is applicable to him or her, e.g., he or she must have entirely discarded the use of foreign cloth and adopted only hand-spun and handwoven garments, must be a believer in Hindu-Muslim Unity, and in the unity amongst all the communities

professing different religions in India as an article of faith, nust believe in nou violence as absolutely essential for the ediress of the Khulafat and the Punjab wrongs and the attainment of Swaraj and if a Hindu must by his personal conduct show that he regards untouchability as a blot upon nationalism

(2) In the event of mass Civil Disobedience a District or Tehsil should be treated as a unit, and therein a vast majority of the population must have adopted full Swadeshi and must be clothed out of cloth hand-spun and hand woven in that District or Tehsil and must believe in and practise all the other items of Non Co-operation

Provided that no civil resister should expect to be supported out of public funds and members of the familles of civil resisters undergoing sentence will be expected to support themselves by carding handispinning and hand weaving or any other means.

Provided further that upon application by any Provincial Congress Committee, it is open to the Working Committee to relax the conditions of Civil Disobedience if it is satisfied that any condition should be waived

Though the above Resolution of the All India Congress Committee gave power to every Provincial Committee to start Civil Disobedience on its own responsibility yet Mahatmaji took care by means of informal conversations to warn the representatives of the several Committees against precipitate action. He told them that the time for exercising their power had not then arrived. Therefore, he enjoined them to concentrate, in the first instance on the fulfilment of the Spinning and Khaddar programme, and then to finish by fulfilling the other conditions vital to the maintenance of the peaceful character of the struggle. In the meantime, he would have launched his campaign of Civil Disobedience at Bardoli. At that time it would be the duty of every other Province closely to watch the course of happenings at Bardoli and taking lessons therefrom, train and equip themselves for action whenever called upon." Thus instructed by Mahatmaji as regards their responsibilities as representatives of the Provincial Committees in the matter of starting mass civil disobedience within their respective jurisdictions, the different Provincial leaders bade him farewell

Seth Jamnalal, when about to depart, said to me,-"Kushnadasu, I know you would never leave Bapuji's side, otherwise I would have obtained his permission to take you with me to Wardha" I also in my turn now took my final leave of Sethii' For, I was cherishing the hope that when Mass Civil Disobedience would be launched at Bardoli, and there would be firing of shots by the military, I should be at Mahatmaji's side Already it was reported that the Government were anxious to arrive at an understanding, and Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya was already there to interview Mahatmaji in connection with the Government offer to restore Smyrna and Thrace to Turkey. Panditji pressed the matter earnestly, but the report was that Mahatmaji was able without much difficulty to bring home to the former the futility of the suggestion meantime, the decision was arrived at that on the 23rd of the month an ultimatum was to be sent to the Government, and that for that purpose there was to be on the 22nd, a meeting of the Working Committee to which all the great leaders were to come once again for final deliberations. Those of us who were there and in constant cootact with Mahatmaji receiving his inspiration now began to indolge to the hope that if by God's grace Mahatmaji's efforts in the way of a oon violent revolt of the people based wholly on their power of self suffering as against the onslaughts of military violence should be crowned with success then a a civilised method of winoing freedom should have been discovered replacing the barbarous methods of violence in vogue all the world over. In that way we began to hope that the success of Mahatmaji's experiment should have revolutionised the whole course of the world's thoughts and added a luminous page in its unending story.

FIVE DAYS' TOUR

Mahatmaji would have much liked if he could hasten back to Gujarat as soon as his business at Delhi had been finished, for his whole heart was set on completing the preparations for Civil Disobedience at Bardoli But though he could decline every one of the many invitations that were then pouring in upon him from different parts of the country, he could not decline Mr Lajapat Rai's, to come spend at least one day at Lahore, so that he could preside at the Convocation of the Punjab National University which had been fixed for the 9th November On the 6th November was held at Delhi the sixth sesssion of the All-India Hindu Sabha, which Mahatmaji attended, while the 7th, being a Monday, was his day of silence and was passed also at Delhi Then, on the 8th at 8 A M, we left Delhi for Muttra where we arrived at 11 A M At Muttra, Mahatman was kept busily engaged for the rest of the day in connection with the Muttra Political Conference Then, in the evening we left for Lahore by the Peshawar Mail

A little before our departure from Delhi, an orderly came in great hurry with a letter and earnestly requested an immediate reply. The letter was from an American lady, Miss Gertrude Emerson, who had been for a few days past seeking an opportunity to meet Mahatmaji, and who had than arrived in Delhi with that object in view Mahatmaji, who was about to start for the station, replied to Miss Emerson, mentioning the dates of his stay at different places in the course of his tour. Accordingly, Miss Emerson left Delhi and got 10to the very train by which Mahatmaji was to travel from Delhi to Lahore, and succeeded in coming up with him for the first time, at Ferozepur, whence she followed him as far as Lahore. Afterwards this lady eager and enthusiastic, paid a visit to the Satyagrahashram at Sabarmati, and had a long interview with him. She then told him that she intended to proceed to Europe from Iodia via. Constantinople. When she was about to take leave Mahatmaji spoke to her of the probability of his incarceration at no distant date, and so desired to bid her a long farewell. At this cultured lady, although separated from Mahatmaji hy a wide gulf of race and creed seemed visibly moved.

Then there was an Euglish gentleman a Christian Missiouary who after a number of attempts at last succeeded in interviewing Mahatman. He was enthustastic in his enlogies of Mahatman for his having succeeded in awakening a desire among the masses to reform and purify their lives and character The missionary geotleman was leaving shortly for Eogland and expressed his eagerness to be the hearer of a message from Mahatman to the English people He took out from his pocket a white Khaddar cap which he had bought at the bazaar He would take it to England as a memento of the present movement. Mahatmaji s message was that 'he entertained no hatred or ill will towards anybody and that he was no enemy of England What he was doing in India for the benefit of the children of the soil would he was convinced also ultimately benefit England

Here, however, I must not omit to mention an incident in which I had to take part, which paints in lurid colours a different side of the White man's character. We had taken the Peshawar Mail at Muttra on our way to Lahore via Delhi, where the Mail stopped for over an hour. It was then past 9 P M, and Mahatmaji had gone to bed. Adjoining Mahatmaji's second class compartment was a third class compartment set apart for personal attendants of second class passengers I was entitled to enter that compartment, being one of Mahatmaji's personal attendants. But an armed Gurkha sepoy, who was in that compartment took his stand at the door and prevented my entrance who was accompanying Maulana Azad Sobhani, then came forward and gave a sharp rebuke to the Gurkha, who instantly left in a rage, to inform his officer. Presently an English official-probably a Military officer-put in an appearance and in unparliamentary language bawled out that I should immediately get down. In a gentlemanly manner I protested, but that only made him the more He seemed to be prepared to use force against me Then I went and saw Devadas in Mahatmaji's compartment He came, with me and both of us now took our seats in the servants' compartment The English officer again tried to frighten and coerce us into leaving that compartment,—first, by using the language of threat, and when that failed, with the help of a European Railway official But this only led to an altercation, in the midst of which Devadas rather inadvertently let fall the words, "we are Mr. Gandhi's servants" At the very mention of Mahatmaji's name, the two Europeans were dumbfounded The Railway official then said quite apologetically— Is Mr Gaudhi travellling by this train? Then it is all right. You please take your seats. He then left and the other gentleman also quietly withdrew. The Gurkha soldier now seeing the tables turned on humaster in this most unexpected manner got demoralised and though he continued to travel with me for the rest of the night had not the courage to offer any further resistance.

The next morning (9th November) we arrived at Ferozepur, which after attending a meeting and doing other items of business Mahatmaji left taking train at 9 30 At 12 noon we reached Labore. In Labore he was the guest of Lala Lajpat Rat Lalaji had founded a school known as the Tilak School of Politics for whose no commodation he had given over a part of his own family residence. We had our quarters in this school building The students of the school were unwested in their attentions to us. We have found that wherever Mahaimah went, people gathered in their thousands and the place became almost a scene of poblic festivitles. So also here. Here there was hurry and bustle on every side and there was rejoicing everywhere Mahatmaji was almost literally taken possession of by Lalaji so that during the couple of days that he stayed at Lahore we who were Mahatman s personal attendants were practically relieved of all anxiety on his score

A short while after we had been lodged Mahatmaji left to attend a meeting of ladies. At 5 in the after noon he had another meeting at the Bradlangh Hall where he had to preside at the Annual Convocation of the National University of the province. When he was about to leave for the meeting he rather abruptly put me the question-" Would you like to come with me?" I was puzzled I could not give an immediate answer I would go wherever I am wanted, in order to wait on him, otherwise I did not feel the urge or the need for attending any meeting. Therefore, not knowing exactly what answer should be proper for me to make, I kept quiet When no answer came from me, Mahatmaji, rather sorry, as it seemed to me, said to me -" Very well, friend, Miss Emerson will be coming at 6 P M, you will attend to lier," and with that lie left. I was much troubled by the feeling that Mahatmaji was not quite pleased at my keeping away from the Convocation ceremony. So at last entrusting Pyeralal with the duty of attending to Miss Emerson, I went with Devadas to the Bradlaugh Hall meeting. There I found Miss Emerson stated near Mahatmaji The Bradlaugh Hall was literally packed with people Being too far off from the speakers, we could not hear the speeches But the Hall was resounding with the frequent and continued cheering of thousands upon thousands of people, and by its reaction upon the nerves, it produced a thrill of excitement and intoxication quite incapable of expression It was an emotional experience of a unique character and when Devadas and I returned home, we were still under its spell

The whole of the next day was passed by Maliatmaji amidst almost a hurricane of engagements. Firstly there was the ceremony of the opening of the Tilak School of Politics, at which he had to preside, then he had to attend a meeting of the Punjab Provincial Congress Committee, then there was to be a meeting of the merchant community, then there was to be a consultation with the Udasi merchants then separate consultation with the leaders of the Hindu and Mussalman communities and so on and so on In the evening Mahatmaji attended a monster mass meeting. Here the excitement and disorder passed all limits. The honge audience refused to calm down. So without even attempting to address the meeting Mahatmaji had to dissolve it. But now the multitude Instead of dispersing In an orderly fashion began to behave in a most unruly manner. All order and discipline was lost, and everybody was in danger of getting crushed by the impact of surging humanity especially as the darkness of night had set in and enveloped the whole scene. The meeting having been dissolved we proceeded direct to the station and left Lahire by the 8-30 P M train

At the time I am speaking of taking a broad general view of the situation one was lost in wonder and amazement -amazement at the unity enthusiasm and spirit of hopefulness visible on every side through out the length and breadth of this vast country. But here In the Panjab one seemed to notice a rift within the lute For here the Hindus and Muslims were still sharply divided on many matters which had bred communal animosities. Malia maji tried his best to help in composing the communal differences, and to that end he did not spare himself. But I was not quite elear in my mind as to whether his efforts had met with the necessary amount of success. Then there was another matter before Mahatmaji for disposal. It was the quarrel over the "Lawrence Statue ut Lahore between the Municipality and the Panjab Government. The quarrel had started about this time, and there was a proposal from the public that Civil Disobedience might very lawfully be launched to give effect to the Municipal decision to remove the statue Mahatmaji agreed that on this particular issue there was a case and an opportunity for engaging in Civil Disobedience But the real point in his opinion was whether it could be prosecuted with as much caution as the case demanded If such a campaign should have to be be started it must be done after the fullest consideration, and after all adequate safeguards had been provided and in no case, according to him, should the group of civil resisters approaching the statue exceed five in num-I could clearly see that Mahatman had ber at a time serious misgivings as to whether the Lahore people had the stamina to submit to rough-handling and persecution at the hands of the authorities, that is to say, without indulging in retaliation and creating a breach of the peace. The previous day's incident at the Bradlaugh Hall had also given Mahatmaji an insight into the Lahore people's power of self-restraint Admittance into the Hall was to be regulated by tickets, and accordingly a fixed number of tickets had been issued to the public to suit the seating capacity of the Hall But people without tickets came and by sheer strength of numbers overpowered the volunteers, who had been posted to guard the door, and so forced an entrance In the circumstances, Mahatmaji had to appeal to the trespassers to leave the Hall, but no heed was paid to his appeal Thus, during his brief stay at Lahore, Mahatmaji saw that so long as the mass-mind continued to remain so uncontrolled and undisciplined as at Lahore, it was in no way safe to experiment with Civil Disobedience

Leaving Lahore on the 10th November by the 8-30 P.M. train and after spending a whole uight and a whole day in the train Mahatman arrived at Aimere on the 11th at 12 midulght. In the depth of the night we saw the town of Aimere illuminated to give a welcome to Mahatmail on his arrival. With bands playing and a display of fireworks an innumerable throug took him in procession through the town Mahatmaji gave himself no respite but kept awake the whole of the night with a view to finish his programme which included among other engagements attending a public meeting visiting the local National School and a visit to the famous Darrah of the place. Then early next morning (12th November) we left for Ahmedabad He had planned in his own mind that he should be present at Bardoli on the 16th November, and that the ultimatum to the Government should have to be sent on the 23rd. Thus his whole programme was cut out and he felt that he had not a single day to lose

We arrived at the Ashiam about midnight on the 12th On Sunday, the 13th, there was a meeting of the Gujarat Provincial Congress Committee, specially convened to devise ways and means to give effect to the Civil Disobedience Resolution of the All-India Congress Committee Mahatman attended the meeting The question was, which of the two Talugas, Anand of the Kaira district, and Bardoli of the district of Surat, both under the jurisdiction of the Provincial Committee, should be entrusted with the task of initiating the Civil Disobedience movement. The matter was keenly debated by the representatives of the rival There was warmth of feeling evinced on both sides, but what impressed me was the utter absence of the display of ill-feeling, or anger, or impatience, or of the use of unparliamentary language, in the course of the discussion. As a matter of fact I had never known before of a fight over a controversial matter carried on with so much gentleness, and good feeling venerable Abbas Tyebji Saheb as representing the Anand Taluqa, was the first to use and plead his cause. He began with a few words of mild rebuke addiessed in the most endearing of terms to Mahatman Said he, - "Do tell us what more condition we have got to fulfil! This time we are determined not to let you go -we are prepared to meet your demands to the full, only tell us once and for all, the whole of your terms Did you not call for a crore of rubees and have we not with one greantic effort raised it for you? 'Go and produce Khaddar .- that bas also beeo your call to us Now look at me and satisfy yourself whether old as I am I have not followed your call and toured village after village till my old dry bones are begin ning to rattle within me Now come and visit the villages and see for yourself bow matters stand and if there is any thing more to be dooe let us know it now. But you must assure us that you are not going to have a new fancy of yours and that all our bopes are not going to be dashed to pieces. The spirit of sweet submissiveness which informed every word of Tyehn Saheh's cast a spell over all and I marvelled how Mahatmaji could draw all hearts as by a secret irresistible power and thus bind them all together though a common central attraction. That a septuagen ariau like Mr Tyebji one time Chief Justice of the State of Baroda, should have cast to the winds all thought of personal comfort and all thought of enjoyment of wealth and riches and should have thus dedicated himself to the carrying out of Malatmaji's programme with the dauot less energy and ardour of youth was indeed a most in spiring sight

The point urged by Tyebji Saheb was that it was in the district of Kaira (Gijarat) that the flag of Civil Dis obedience was first boisted o and that in that connection the people of the Anand sub-division had undergone an excellent course of training in the practice and methods of Civil Disobedience. Therefore the right and privilege

This has reference to the Non paymentof Revenue Movement at Kaira inaugurated by Mahatmaji in 1918

of starting Civil Disobedience should in the first instance go to Anand But Mr Kalyanji, the intrepid worker of Surat (Gujarat), speaking on behalf of Bardoli, advanced a most fascinating plea in its favour Said he,-"The English first entered India through the gate of Surat, and it was -there that they effected their first settlement, and it was from there that English influence, radiating as from a centre with slow, gradual steps overspread the whole Indian con-It is meet, therefore, that when the time for putting down that power has come, Surat should lead the way as a right which inalienably belongs to her Is it not meet and proper that the way chosen for the entrance of the British should also be the way for their exit? In that way also Surat should have a chance of absolving her--self of her original guilt " This striking and original plea urged by Kalyanji on behalf of Bardoli (a part of Surat district), visibly delighted the whole audience. The discussion on the competing claims of the two Taluqas or sub-divisions went on apace, but it was finally decided that both had earned the right to start Civil Disobedience But although this was so, what was practically settled was this Mahatmaji was to undertake a tour of inspection, visiting first Bardoli, and then Anand, and as the result of such inspection, he should have to find out for himself which of the two centres was in a more advanced state of preparation, so that the fight might begin from there Now, Mahatmaji had already planned to start for Bardoli on the 16th November, but both the Talugas prayed for a couple of days more to complete their preparations Meantime, as was well-known, H R H the Prince of Wales was to land at Bombay on the 17th November on a visit to India, and the Bombay non co-operators were solicitous that Mahatmaji should be present at Bombay on that day. But he had no time and had to decline repeated telegraphic messages of invitation sent by his own people there. At last on the 15th November such an appealing request by wire came from the Secretary of the Bombay Provincial Congress Committee that Mahatmaji had not the heart to refinse it. It was therefore decided that he should reach Bombay on the morning of the 17th and leave again the same night arriving in Snrat on the morning of the 18th and thence proceed to Bardoli

It was clear to me now that there was no prospect of our returning to the Ashram until ufter the task of Bardoli had been finally and successfully accomplished Nor could I anticipate where or for how long, or under what circum stances should we find ourselves in the times that werecoming Keeping in view these uncertain contingencies I had to make my preparations for the departure arranging, selecting and packing up things. While thus engaged I received on the 14th November an Express telegram from my teacher Mr Makerji, requiring me to be at the Ashram to receive an important letter from him And, again on the 15th I had a second telegram from him say ing "I prefer your not going out. I was in a fix It was not possible for me to go against my teachers express wishes But I had also certain definite tasks which Mahatmaji had assigned to me and in regard to which he implicitly trusted me If however I must not leave the Ashram and accompany Mahatmaji in his im pending tour who was going to do the work for me? Could I without explaining matters to him clearly or without making over my charge to a substitute, merely give out that I was not going to accompany him, or that I was not going to do my prescribed duties? When in the afternoon of the 15th the second telegram came, Mahatman and other inmates of the Ashram had gone out to the City to attend meeting in celebration of the death anniversary of Premchand Roychand, a large-hearted Parsi millionaire of Bombay I had not gone but was alone in Mahatman's room keeping watch. Receiving the telegram when thus alone, and reading its contents, I was tossed hither and thither by the currents of conflicting emotions I was sorely puzzled and perplexed There was my duty to my teacher, which was imperative, equally imperative was my duty to discharge the responsibilities of daily work which Mahatman had assigned to me Which of the two should have precedence? Again, for the last few days, in his letters Mukern had been urging on me that "if I must needs undertake any new or special responsibility, I must make sure that I was not wanting in the necessary capacity, and that, secondly, before undertaking any such responsibility, it was incumbent on me to consult my innermost feelings. In other words, he explained, I must be quite clear whether I was following the promptings of my heart, or whether I was merely drifting along the current, yielding to what after all was a temporary excitement or a temporary enthusiasm caused by extraneous circumstances" Lastly, he had been reminding me that "I was here with Mahatmaji charged with a definite mission, viz, to look after Mahatmaji's health, and his personal needs and comforts Therefore, my constant care should be that there was not the slightest remissness in the discharge of that particular duty If. however. apart from that any independent responsible nork was proposed by Mahatmaji. I must exercise to the full my powers of reasoning and judgment before agreeing to accept it. Referring to something far better than mere reasoning as a guide to one s judgment he had been telling me that 'If one could still for the moment the external tumolt of feellings and emotions and get down to the deeper layers of one s consciousness one could hear the still small voice within the message of the soul telling him which way he should go If one could decide on one s duty in the light of that message then the path of one s duty was clear and free from error Then one could fearlessly proceed on his own way strong m the strength of the spirit within even if the whole of the powers of the world combined to offer resistance part of his teaching I could follow in the abstract with the help of my intellect, but the question forme was- Was I sufficiently advanced spiritually to be able unerringly to hear the Call of Truth? I felt that for me to be able to do so was beyond my wildest dreams. In that troubled state of mind not knowing which was to turn I laid myself down by the side of Malintman's bed on the open verandali adjoining from the City looking very happy. He began to talk to me quite cheerfully and questioned me on a variety of things. If it had been any other day I should have felt it a great boon to be thus addressed by Mahatman. But that evening I just managed to stammer out some sort of replies to his many queries. Alas I to so much kindness and friendli ness of treatment I could make no adequate response l 1 thought I would keep awake all night and try if I coold possibly get some inkling of the truth about me from within

But my body being weak, my limbs soon relaxed and I fell asleep without my knowing it

As arranged, we must leave for Bombay the following evening (16th Nov) and finding that I could not come to any decision myself, I thought of placing the whole matter before Mahatmaji. So after the morning prayers when he was alone for a while, I quietly went and took my seat near him, and reading out to him some two or three of Mr Mukerji's letters and the telegrams, wanted to know what my duty was under the circumstances

He said,—"Just wait and see what you have in the letter to which Satish Babu refers you. You can finally decide after going through its contents. For we shall be returning next Sunday (20th November). I do not see, therefore, any harm in your going with me to Bombay to-day. If you don't wish to go out with me after we return, I won't object."

Then, he went on to say,—"If at Bardoli I am arrested, it does not follow that my Secretary should also be arrested. At Waltair when Maulana Mahomed Ali was arrested, his Secretary was not arrested, as you know."

After a pause Mahatmaji went on to say —"Yes, it before accepting a responsibility, "the voice within" could be clearly heard, then of course that message becomes absolute. But it is no easy thing to be able to receive such "higher inspiration". The pre-condition for it is that there must be a great 'crisis" of the soul when you are literally racked by "mental anguish and torture". In that crisis, the soul (of the individual) either soars higher and higher towards the Infinite Soul, or else, unable to bear the terrible strain, falls back and finds rest in a closer association with the physical body. In the first alternative the voice of Truth is heard. In the other, the Individual gets identified with the world of matter, and shapes his conduct accordingly.

Mahatmaji's next words were these — The question, what should be your line of work after I am arrested has been occupying my thoughts for some time and as the result of such consideration. I have come to the conclusion that if you so choose you can very well du the work of Young India. That is why I have told you about It before. But it may be that in my absence you may not feel quite the same encouragement to du the work. If that happens you may give It up

Mahatmajl's concluding wurds were as fullows — What Satish Babu wishes as I understand him is that when I would be making my final dispositions you should not without full consideration allow yourself to accept any responsibility. If that be so I fully accept the position But to-day you can come along with me. To that I do not see what ubjection there could possibly be.

Tu this I had nothing to say So I immediately sent a wire to Mr Mnkerji at Benarcs to the following effect—"In ubedience to Mahatmaji's wishes I am leaving this evening with him for Bombay and shall be returning with him to the Ashram next Sunday

That very day when it was ubout noon Mahatmali a Dak (Mail) arrived, and with it I received Mr Mukerji s expected letter. In view of the impending campaign at Bardoli Mr Mnkerji was anxions to explain to me what he thought about it so that I might be helped in making up my mind as to my duty at the time of thu 'final dispositions.

by Mahatman. He wrote, -- "He has nothing to say against the adoption of civil disobedience to combat iniquity and oppression when every other lawful remedy or effort has But although this is so, still we could not be too failed cautious about it For such disobedience based, as it must be on Mahatmaji's ideal of voluntary sacrifice and suffering cheerfully accepted by the people as the penalty inflicted by the oppressor, for such disobedience, must not be converted into the other kind of disobedience namely, "uncivil", or criminal disobedience, whose one aim is to inflict violence, injury and suffering on the oppressor. In the latter alternative, the disobedience instead of partaking of the character of a peaceful revolt of the people, such as Mahatmaji contemplates, becomes in fact an armed revolt, or something akin to it. He is, therefore, of opinion that if the disobedience in question be prompted by the spirit of retaliation against the oppiessoi, or under conditions of temporary popular excitement or frenzy, then it would never be possible to make it a "civil," i.e., non-violent, popular revolt Of all forms of "disobedience in Mahatmaji's programme, this one (mass civil disobedience) represents the final or the culminating stage Before, therefore, this weapon of mass civil disobedience, the ultimate and most difficult weapon in Mahatmaji's armoury could properly be wielded by the people at large, it is extremely necessary that for some time more the educated classes, who will have to guide the masses in this matter, should go on learning the lessons of voluntary sacrifice and suffering by undergoing a previous course of progressive training in the several *boycotts" as laid down in the Congress Resolutions.

^{*} Vide the principal Resolutions passed in September, 1920 and

"When these preparatory and comparatively easy lessons in self sacrifice and self suffering have been well learnt by the educated leaders and guides of the masses, so that the practice of voluntary withdrawal of services from Government has become easy and habitual for them, then only would they acquire the moral right as also the strength and confidence to call upon the people at large to follow them fearlessly in a campaign of sacrifice and suffer ing on a mass-scale such as is necessarily involved in mass civil disobedience. But as long as Government schools and colleges, Government law courts and legislatures official functions durbars and levees continue to have a secret fascination for the educated classes so long there is no gainsaying that the movement of volun tary sacrifice and suffering which must precede any movement in favour of civil disobedience as being the easier of the two has not made much headway among the country's leaders. Whence it follows that so long as this state of their moral dependence upon the Government continues so long the country's moral atmosphere and its moral relationship with the Government are both favourable and helpful to the latter. Therefore, under such conditions of dependence the country will have to rely for what progress it can make mainly on Government support On the other my teacher concedes that it is possible for the country's leaders without having passed through a course of preparatory training in voluntary sacrifice and suffering to create a fit of excitement among the people by inflaming their passions or they may even succeed in rousing in them wrongs inflicted on them by the latter. He further concedes that in that way the leaders may be able to prepare the way for hostilities and revolt by the people. But that clearly, he points out, would be no "civil" resistance, or "civil" revolt, and for non-co-operators pledged to non-violence it could not be thought of. Therefore, if "civil" disobedience is undertaken by the masses at the instance of the leaders, before the leaders themselves have sufficiently imbibed the comparatively easy lessons of self-sacrifice and self-suffering as laid down in the several boycotts in the Congress Resolutions, his conviction was that the experiment would end in disaster."

With regard to my own duty at this time, Mi Mukerji warned me that I must not allow myself to be thrown off my feet by the general excitement, but must give the fullest consideration to all sides of the question before enlisting as a soldier in the army of civil resisters at Bardoli He next referred me to an article by Mahatmaji in the latest issue of Young India (10th November) under the caption, "The Momentous Issue", quoting from it the two following passages —

"He (the civil resister) invites imprisonment and other uses of force against himself, this he does because and when he finds the bodily freedom he seemingly enjoys to be an intolerable burden"

"Civil Resistance is a most powerful expression of a soul's anguish"

On the basis of these two extracts, Mr Mukerji asked ne to consider truthfully "whether the personal or bodily freedom I had been enjoying had really become intolerable to me , and secondly whether in respect thereof I had been experiencing any anguish of the soul Further be explained that 'when any work is undertaken untruthfully e g., by merely allowing oneself to drift along the current, or by being led away by the excitement of the moment, then, God s eye will never be on the work and it will never succeed On the contrary the chances are that evil will result and the country will suffer Lastly quoting for my benefit the following sentence from the aforesaid article One perfect civil resister is enough to win the battle of Right against Wrong -he went on to remark that if the place of genuine civil resisters is filled by imitation ones then indeed the latter might for a time belp to swell the ranks, but as for solving the country's problem or enforcing its demands, that must remain a distant dream.

Pondering over all these questions as stated in Mr Mukerji's letter, I felt myself more than ever at sea and so with anxiety fear and misgiving weighing on my heart, I set out for Bombay in the company of Mahatman

BOMBAY RIOTS-I

We arrived in Bombay early in the morning of the 17th November The sun was shining in a clear sky. The four quarters were resplendent with his rays, and the whole city lay smiling under the bright canopy of drove from the As we station quarters, nothing unusual met our eyes. The old familiar sights were there, and these were all But now on this very day, the Prince of Wales was to set foot on India's soil Elaborate preparations had accordingly been made, and entertainments of all sorts had been arranged by the authorities to ensure for the Prince a fitting welcome The provision on a lavish scale of popular attractions and festivities at a time when pain and affliction like an iron dart had entered into the very heart of India's body politic struck me as evidence of an utter insensibility to the feelings Toys are put into the hands of children to of the people divert them, so that they may not cry out while suffering So also at this critical juncture in the history of India, India's children were sought to be soothed and diverted from their cries by a piece of political legerdemain which consisted in bringing to India's shores His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, and providing all manner of shows, festivities and entertainments in celebration of the event How else is it possible to account for the strange fact that the Prince was brought over to India during a time of the greatest stress and when discontent and revolution were stalking across the land The Congress anthorities were able to see through the deep political game which the Government were determined on playing and therefore they advised an all India Hartal* on the very day of the Prince s landing (17th November) The prevailing conflict between the official and popular points of view got accentuated and indeed assumed fearful proportions through this question of the boycott of the Prince's visit. In order that the Bombay people might not fall into the Government trap the Bombay leaders had arranged for a mass meeting under the presidency of Mahatmail to be held at the other extremity of the city at the very time when the Prince was to land. In the meanwhile, the previous evening a score of Congress volunteers had been put under arrest on a charge of circulating the procla mation about the Hartal and all the printed copies of notices over the names of the Congress leaders for distribution among the public kept in the Swarai Sabha office had been surreptitiously got bold of and secretly removed

But all these efforts on the part of the Government to put a stop to the Hartal went for nothing. The vast body of the general population boycotted the official demonstration in favour of the Prince only the Europeans, the Eurasians and the Parisi joining in it. On the other hand the mass meeting on the grounds adjoining the Elphinstone Mills over which Mahatmaji was to preside presented one vast sea of heads. Mahatmaji proceeded to the meeting after having taken some rest at his lodging. His address was devoted to explaining the absointeneed of keeping the peace and observing non violence. He said that he was going to

It means a voluntary cossistion of all outside activities for purposes of demonstration of a deep public feeling. launch Civil Disobedience at Baidoli very Soon, when probably there would be firing on the people by the military But whatever might happen to Bardoli, his one request to the people of Bombay was that they must under no circumstances allow themselves to be thrown of their balance At this meeting there were people with foreign caps on, and people wearing foreign garments. The sight cut Manatmaji to the quick On one side was piled up quite a heap of foreign clothing which were to be consigned to the Maulana Azad Sobhani, Pandit Nekiram and a few others having addressed the meeting, Mahatmaji went up to the pile and set it alight, and then left. While returning home from the meeting in the company of Mr Revashanker in another car, I noticed big parties of mill-hands in a state of great excitement returning in motor lorries from the meeting to the city proper. They were behaving boisterously, each party being under the guidance of a leader who was blowing a whistle and directing the course. The meeting having been dispersed, thousands upon thousands were returning home. While we were in the midst of this seething mass, I could not realise the situation as foreshadowed by the conduct of the mill-hands. But further on at another point our car was pelted with stones. Some of them fell into it. We stopped the car, when some half-adozen mill-hands began to lay violent hands on it with long A gentleman dressed in handspun who was passing that way sharply reprimanded them and they dispersed This was about 11-30 A M We returned home and forgot all about the incident. It was nothing more than mere pranks on the part of naughty youngsters of the locality, so we thought

When however, it was I P M Mahatmaii was apprised that a serious outbreak was in progress, and that disorderly scenes were being enacted in different parts of the city. In the company of a few associates Mahatmaji left. Then about 5 in the afternoon he had to go out again to stop forther rioting. Returning home from his first visit he parrated to us how nil those who had been driving in motor cars had been pounced open and subjected to cruelties and indignities and that even people clad in handspun had not escaped such disgraceful treatment. The Parsis as a community having joined in the demonstration of welcome to the Prince, in defiance of the wishes of the general body of people, had been the target of attacl. When they were returning home from the Reception ceremnny honour of the Prince the toreign cars and foreign garments on their persons were select and consigned to the flames. Many Parsy gentlemen had also been assault ed and the report was that one or two Parsi ladies had also been hurt. Many liquor shops had been smashed and one motor car and two tramears had also been hurnt down. A Police Station and another building had been set on fire and given over to the flames. Four policemen had been besten to death by lather (long poles) and two more had sustained such severe jointies that there was little hope of their survi-The last two had been lying prostrate on the earth oo the highway when Mahatmaji arrived and beheld the heart rending scene. A huge crowd had gathered and there was terrible noise and confusion all around. When they saw Mahatmaji in their midst they gave themselves up to frenzied demonstrations and began to shout Maliatran Gandhi ki jar (i e victory to Mahatma Gandhi). He reproved them and ordered them off Sprinkling water on the face of the policemen he remained there for some time nursing them. Then after having made arrangements for their removal to the hospital he left. From every part of the city reports of frightful excesses, of murder, of rioting continued to pour in till ten in the night. Mahatmaji had been an eye-witness of such dieadful scenes, and the agony which he suffered is beyond description. Thrown into a state of utter despondency, he began to include in such words of grief and bitter self-reproach as would melt even the stoniesthearted amongst men. He kept awake till one in the morning pouring out in this manner his deepest feelings. Weighed down by guel and remorse, he went on recalling the high hopes with which he had been directing the movement had been hoping that by the eighth of December, he should be in a position, to place before the Government his final terms. But alas! those hopes had now all vanished into thin air And for this who else was responsible than his own self? That very morning when he had been addressing the meeting and expressing his sorrow that some amongst his hearers should be wearing foreign caps, he had seen those caps being forcibly removed by others, and on some previous occasions also, he had been a witness of similar acts and yet he had failed to protest against them. The spirit of intolerance had gone on increasing unchecked, and had culminated in this huge conflagration at Bombay from the very first he had not had the sagacity to stand up against every such exhibition of intolerance and violence.such was the charge he went on repeating against himself in tones of bitter despair and self-reproach

circumstance Mahatmaji had come to believe that there were directing brains behind this outbreak of mob-violence He had noticed at particular places some people of the class that usually attended public meetings taking the lead and directing the mob Further at one particular point Mahatmaji had appealed to the moters to disperse and return to their homes, but they had refused to listen to him Mahat mail's belief was that they were being controlled by outside agencies. The incident had made the deepest impression noon his mind. If at Bombay mob violence was being engineered and directed by skilled hands from behind, then the launching of Civil Disobedience at Bardoll must remain a chimera Listening to these words of pain and despair from the lips of Mahatmail the picture of India's luckless future and of her misery stood ont in bold relief before the mind s eye and one had to struggle with himself to preserve one s mental equanimity

Mahatmaji gave expression to his thankfulness to God for His having opened his eyes and saved the situation. The Lord has saved me from a dire calamity. I was most unwilling to come to Bombay but God wanted me to see the sights that I have seen and dragged me to Bombay. If to-day I had stayed at Ahmedabad I might have easily belittled the happenings in Bombay and paid little heed to them. But the terrible scenes that have been enacted before my own eyes could not passibly be put uside and who knows what further disasters would await us if at this moment Civil Disobedience should be resorted to at Bardoli.

That very night Mahatmaji cancelled his original programme of visiting Surat and Bardoli and sent his son

Devadas to Surat to carry the news about the Bombay nots. He also sent word through Devadas that all preparations for Civil Disobedience must be suspended. When it was past eleven at night a party of enthusiastic young men and volunteers came and reported that for all practical purposes the city was quiet. But that did not pacify Mahatmaji who continued to remain in a state of anxious suspense about the immediate future.

The next morning (18th November), the sun rose lighting up every quarter of the heavens with a tranquil splendour and all Nature put on a smiling countenance But those smiles of Nature, alas! what are they? Thou, Goddess, do thou cease to spread before man the net of thy enchanting beauty, which makes him thy dupe! For within the folds of thy external charms he concealed the coils of thy cruelty and inhumanity. Why else should thy lovely hills and dales, thy sweet murmuring brooks and springs, and thy forests of vast surpassing grandeur nurse in their breasts wild ferocious beasts and animals? So also within the bosom of that day, lit up with effulgent rays falling from a clear, cloudless sky, lay quietly hid a dark mass of barbarities and inhumanities such as few could have conceived

From the reports that had been reaching us since the morning it seemed as though the virulence of this epidemic of madness had spent itself out, and that the general body of the population been restored to sanity and would resume the normal course of their respective daily duties. But it was the hull before the storm, the hull that precedes the final cataclysmic storm, when the winds of destruction are let loose. Of this not one single person had the remotest idea at the time Reaction follows action as a matter of course On the previous day the Parsi, the Eurasian and the Jewish residents of Bombay had to meet a most unexpected attack. But to-day they were adequately armed and frantic with rage were thirsting for revenge

Meanwhile the Non co-operators on the local Congress Committees had been roused to action and parties of Congress volunteers and Congress leaders were seen going about, visiting the excited mob in different parts of the city and trying to pacify them. The day previous the event had come as a holt from the blue and had stanned everyhody and no adequate steps could be taken to combat it. But to day there was no remissness anywhere. Every worker was ap and doing and determined that the disorders should come to a speedy end even if he had to lay down his life in the attempt. At half past nine in the morning Mr Moazzam All, brother in law of Maulana Mahomed Ali came with two fellow workers from the Khilafat Committee's office to inform Mahatmaji that they had gone about inspecting the different quarters of the city and that they had found peace everywhere Similarly also others came and saw Mahatmaji, and gave bim reassuring news seeking to alleviate his misery and anxlety. But while all this was going on and Mr Moazzam Ali had not left, we were rung up and the disquieting news came that the mill hands at Parel were holding up tramcars and that an attack on the Parsi community in the neighbour hood was apprehended. Our informant on the telephone plteously implored Mahatmaji's help fearing that unless im mediate steps were taken to bring the mill hands under control rioting robbery and arson would in all likelihood ensue. Mahatmaji was then busy writing an article under the caption, "A Deep Stain," for Young India in which he was narrating the previous day's incidents of which he had been an eye-witness. He, therefore, deputed Maulana Azad Sobhani and Mr Moazzam Ali, with half-a-dozen young men to go and visit Parel immediately, and with instructions to try and prevent a riot, promising to go to the spot himself as soon as the article was finished

After the Maulana Saheb had left with his party, we had to spend every moment of our time in a state of the greatest suspense awaiting news as to what happen-Half-an-hour had not passed when I saw Mi Moazzam Alı with only two of his assistants returning in a 'victoria' But what a sight! They were all bleeding, blood streaming profusely from all parts of their bodies But where was the car? Where, again, was Maulana Azad Sobhani? What had become of the other three companions? Mr Moazzam Ali's wounds were less serious and he could give a connected account of what had happened A party composed of Parsis, Eurasians and Jews had attacked them, smashed their cai, and brutally assaulted them He could not tell whether after all Maulana Azad Sobhani and the three others were still alive, or what had become of them. The two Khilafat workers were too severely wounded to be able to state anything coherently They only pointed to their broken heads, and wounds all over their bodies, and then with choked breath went on repeating the cry, like one suffering from delinum-"We also have given of our blood! We also have given of our blood!" We were already engaged in rendering first aid to this party of three, but shortly after, one by
